The rule is for the very purpose of saying to the House, "You must change existing law by general law. We have here a precious parliamentary weapon when it is wielded in behalf of the Treasury, the people, and law in general, which will prevent and preclude you from raising appropriations." Even though the House did go into it, we can strike it out if the House entered a domain that it should not enter. It seems to me we can not escape that reasoning. If we can say that because the House entered the domain of new legislation we can follow, it must inevitably be held that when the House enters the domain and provides an appropriation theretofore unknown to the existing law we must have the power to increase it; and we know the rules do not permit that.

I do not see, Mr. President, how we can escape applying the same construction to both provisions of the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Chair for the patience with which he has listened to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Chair rules I desire to say that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] called attention to some decision of former Vice President Marshall. I do not recall any decision such as the Senator cited. I remember a decision to the effect that if a provision was subject to a point of order and the point of order was not made, another amendment could be offered to it which was not in order and the point of order would not be sustained.

Mr. LENROOT. That could hardly have arisen, because under the practice of the Senate a point of order may be made at any time, so it could not have been the kind of case to which the Senator from Mississippi refers.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the rule of the other House.

Mr. LENROOT. In the House that is true; that is the rule of the House.

Mr. HARRISON. But in this instance, Mr. President, if the Chair will note, he will observe that the Senate committee amendment proposes to place permanent legislation in the bill. The House provision is only for the coming fiscal year, but the Senate committee amendment proposes to provide for the fiscal year 1923 and annually thereafter, proposing permanent legislation. Certainly we would not adopt any rule here as a precedent to be followed that, simply because the House had exceeded its authority and written into a general appropriation bill a provision without authority of law, then the Senate could widen it and make it permanent authority. The Senate committee then, in order to make legislation in order, could insert simple provisions which would be incorporated in a general appropriation bill, and add to them in order to carry out its point and undo what was done to-day by the resolution proposing to change the rules of the Senate.

I submit that the point of order being made merely to the Senate committee amendment does not affect the House provision at all; that it is left for the Senate upon motion either to strike out or adopt it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The action of the Senate committee, being an amendment to strike out the House provision and insert other matter, is one amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but the Senate committee proposes to provide a permanent law, a law not only for the fiscal year 1923 but for years hereafter, while the House amendment pertains only to this year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly; because the House opened the door in changing existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is perfectly plain that no amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received on any general appropriation bill. If this provision came up as an original proposition, the Chair would be inclined to rule that the point of order was well taken. It seems, however, to be established by precedents, which nobody denies, that the Senate has adopted the other conclusion—and there is a great deal of force to it—that, as the proposition for the new legislation does not originate in the Senate but comes here on a bill from the House of Representatives, therefore the Senate has an inherent right to amend the proposed legislation of the House of Representatives. The Chair therefore rules that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I respectfully—because I have never yet done so—appeal from the decision of the Chair, for this decision, if followed, would absolutely nullify the provisions of the resolution which the Senate adopted to-day.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] contended that one reason why he favored that resolution was that it prevented the placing in general appropriation bills of general or new legislation not authorized by law. Now, under the ruling which the Chair has just made since the resolution was adopted to-day, that whole contention is nullified; and so here we are in a position where we find that the Senate now proposes to undo what they did only a few moments ago. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, but shall not ask for the yeas and nays on my appeal. I do, however, ask for a division on it. I do not make the appeal because the present occupant of the chair has made the ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the appeal more on account of the action of the Senate to-day in adopting the resolution. I wish to know if Senators acted in good faith and meant what they said when they adopted the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is: Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

On a division, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if I understand, then, the point of order is overruled?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, the vote will come first on the adoption of the committee amendment, will it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator in charge of the bill expect to proceed with the discussion of this matter to-night?

Mr. PHIPPS. Not for any length of time. If the item would lead to any considerable discussion, I think it would, perhaps, be better to allow it to go over for later consideration, so that Senators may be thinking the matter over. We could then proceed for a short time with the reading of the bill before adjourning, as it will not be possible to conclude the consideration of this bill to-night.

Mr. HARRISON. It is such an important matter that we would hardly be able to finish it to-night. I therefore ask that the amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is not the intention to conclude the consideration of the bill to-night. I have no objection to the item going over, and proceeding a short time with the reading of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the items for building inspection division, on page 4, line 8, after the word "buildings," to strike out "principal $2,000," and to insert "five at $2,000 each," and in line 12, after the figures "$1,800," to insert "one $1,140," so as to make the paragraph read:

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 23, to increase the total for the executive office from "$126,520" to "$137,210."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the reason for the increase in the salary of the executive secretary of the Public Utilities Commission from $3,500 to $4,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes. The salary at the present times is $4,000, and it has been at that figure, I think, for two or possibly for three years past. The reduction was made in the Budget Commission before the item came to the House.

Mr. HARRISON. The Director of the Budget recommended that it be $3,500?

Mr. PHIPPS. He recommended that it be $3,500.

Mr. HARRISON. This officer has been getting $4,000 for the past three or four years?

Mr. PHIPPS. The position has paid $4,000 for two or three years past.

Mr. HARRISON. Was any reason assigned by the Director of the Budget for reducing it from $4,000 to $3,500?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am not informed as to that, but I do know that the Senate committee made inquiry and had the point up with the commissioners before restoring the figure of $4,000. The Senator will find it in the Senate hearings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. I am advised that there has been an increase of 75 in the number of policemen.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

Mr. KING. I think that is too many, and I desire to have some explanation of the matter. If it may go over until to-morrow, I shall be much obliged.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, in view of the lateness of the hour, and the fact that many Senators probably will be interested in the next paragraph, which includes the items for streets, I think we might stop now for this evening and take an adjournment. Of course the understanding is that the treaties will have precedence after the morning hour if it is desired by the committee to take them up.

I move that the Senate adjourn.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion for just a moment?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish to ask unanimous consent for the introduction out of order and immediate consideration of a resolution. If it leads to any discussion, I shall ask its reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read from the desk.

The reading clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas by unanimous consent, first obtained, the junior Senator from Washington, Mr. POINDEXTER, on the 3d day of February, 1922, caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a letter by him written to a constituent, Mr. Thomas Marshall, of the State of Washington; and

Whereas in said letter the said Senator charges that certain malign and unlawful influences were used, or attempted to be used, to prevent Senators from voting to declare that TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY was a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan and entitled to his seat, a resolution so to declare the said TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY entitled to his seat being then pending in the Senate. Among other charges in said letter appears the following paragraphs:

"Various false assertions have been made as to influences brought to bear to secure votes in NEWBERRY'S behalf in the Senate. I notice a detailed statement in that connection published in several Washington State papers as to my own vote. This statement is libelous and false from beginning to end, as no such influences were brought to bear and no such statements or anything resembling them or anything to that effect were made to me.

"On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY. This may be referred to in more detail later on."

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chair appoint a special committee of three Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Washington, Mr. POINDEXTER.

Further, that the committee be authorized to subpœna witnesses, send for and examine books and papers, and administer oaths, and do all things necessary to procure the evidence in this case, and the expenses hereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just one moment. Does the Senator from New York object?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly do.

Mr. CARAWAY. All I wish to say is that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said he would be glad to have it done. Of course, if the Senator from New York does not desire that it shall be done——

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; I object.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will ask then that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, should not the resolution go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I understand that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule, the Chair is advised that the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, eventually it would have to go to that committee, before any warrants could be paid under it; but it does seem to me that the committee that would have jurisdiction over the merits of the proposition should consider it first, and see whether or not an investigation should be made. If it should so decide, then, of course, the resolution would have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington move——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that the Senator from Arkansas asked unanimous consent to present the resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I asked unanimous consent to present it and have it immediately considered. Does the Senator from New York object?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It takes unanimous consent to do either, does it not? I asked that the resolution be read. It takes unanimous consent to do either. We are not in the order of business of the introduction of resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Arkansas to request permission for consideration, whereupon the Senator from New York asked that the resolution be read. That is the status now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understand that the resolution having been read, it is now before the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President. It was I who asked that the resolution be read in order that I, for one, could pass upon the question whether or not the Senator should have unanimous consent to introduce it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the resolution was read for information——

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that the Senator from New York now has a right to object to its present consideration.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not the status of the matter at all. I asked, out of order, to introduce the resolution, and then I asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration; and then the Senator wanted it read, so that he might determine whether he would consent to its immediate consideration. The resolution is before the Senate, and the Presiding Officer will refer it to some appropriate committee. That is the way the resolution stands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that was not my intention in asking that the resolution be read. The Senator from Arkansas must get unanimous consent to introduce the resolution at this time, much less have it referred; and when he asked consent to introduce it—and he must ask consent to do so—I asked that it be read.

My reason for objecting is just this: There are only about seven or eight Senators here. The preamble is very long. It recites a lot of things and contains some assumptions. I want the Senate to hear the resolution read and then decide what it wants to do with it. The Senator from Arkansas wants it read and then referred to a committee. I do not know whether that is the right committee, whether it should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections or the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate or the Committee on Rules, and I do not think that a few Senators sitting here in the last waning hours of the evening should permit a thing like this to go through and be referred to a committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not what the Senator from New York had in his mind, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It most certainly is. The Senator from Arkansas can not read the mind of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not think I could. I do not make any pretense of doing that. The status was that unanimous consent was asked to introduce the resolution and have it immediately considered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object to its introduction.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was not what the Senator did object to; I do not care what he says now. He objected to its immediate consideration. I am not going to quibble with the Senator about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that when the resolution was sought to be offered by the Senator from Arkansas, the Senator from New York reserved his right to object to the introduction of the resolution. That was the understanding of the Chair, and the Chair so rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. I understood that we were considering the District appropriation bill. Is it contemplated now that that bill shall be laid aside for the purpose of taking up, as the unfinished business, the so-called judges' bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understood that the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside to permit the consideration of the District appropriation bill. Now the unfinished business has again been laid before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 7, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 6, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, we are grateful for the manifestation of Thyself through the dawn of a new day. Rich and abundant art Thou in depths of mercy, and may we fear not. Continue to enlarge our conception of Thee, of life, and of our obligations. Again we would take the pledge of service; and may we feel the high honor which is ours in serving our country and our fellow men. May all intelligence work toward purity and strength, and fill us with faith as we approach, with joyful confidence, the duties of the day. Lift up all nations, and may the long night soon be dissolved into the hope and promise of the world's morning. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 3, 1922, was read and approved.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This being the first Monday in the month, business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is in order. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) to grant authority to continue the use of the temporary buildings of the American Red Cross headquarters in the city of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, may I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], who is a member of the Committee on the Library, that these buildings of the Red Cross are there by permission of Congress, the time for their remaining there having expired. The Senate joint resolution as amended by the House Committee on the Library proposes to extend the time for the buildings to remain there until December 31 next. Practically that would be of no advantage to the Red Cross. I am inclined to think that the buildings ought to be permitted to remain there much longer. They are in nobody's way, and they are necessary in the administration of the work of the Red Cross. Would it not be well to send this resolution back to the Committee on the Library and let that committee investigate the subject very thoroughly?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for having held up this matter on a previous occasion, because it has led to my familiarizing myself with the situation, not alone as to the buildings but as to the work of the Red Cross.

There are on the ground now four buildings. There is first the marble building in front. Behind this is a building which is not discreditable in appearance and which it would be a pity to tear down soon. It will serve the purposes of the organization for some years yet to come.

There is a third building which the officials of the Red Cross had contemplated destroying immediately, but they are now weighing the merits of a proposition to transfer to Washington the work of two of their regional offices, and until that has been decided upon—and if decided upon, carried out—they can not well tell how long the third building should stay.

The fourth building is the brick church which was there when the property was acquired.

I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to put into my remarks a brief statement of the work being done by the Red Cross, not alone as bearing upon this proposal but also in order that there may be accessible a concise record of the extent of the activities of this very noble philanthropy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the statement referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

The report of chapter activities for the month of November, 1921, the last complete report available, is typical of the Red Cross activities throughout the United States.

The high lights of this report are as follows:

Number of active Red Cross chapters	3,452
Number of chapters continuing war work (largely for disabled soldiers and sailors and their families)	2,657
Chapters employing Public Health nurses	938
Chapters engaged in some form of production (for local hospitals or work overseas)	1,460
Chapters giving courses in home hygiene and care of the sick	636
Chapters carrying on some form of health work, such as health centers or community clinics	699
Chapters giving instruction in life saving	272
Chapters giving courses in first aid	316

The total adult and junior membership is approximately 10,000,000.

Home service of some character was extended to 120,000 disabled men or their families by the chapters in November. Eight disasters were served by the Red Cross. More than 123,000 visits were made by the Public Health nurses. Approximately 20,000 students are enrolled in the courses in home hygiene and care of the sick. More than 2,500 students are enrolled in courses in first aid, and members enrolled in the life-saving corps exceed 9,000.

In the calendar year 1921 the Red Cross spent $9,782,000 in assisting the disabled veterans of the World War. Of this sum approximately $7,000,000 was disbursed by Red Cross chapters and the balance by the national organization. National headquarters' expenditure includes an item of $72,000 expended for the Red Cross Institute for the Blind at Evergreen, Roland Park, Md.

The foreign work is mainly concerned with the operation of 325 child health stations. In Poland the organization has been very successful in its efforts to aid in the establishment of schools for the training of nurses.

The juniors are carrying on a number of special projects, such as playgrounds and vacation colonies for the destitute children. The juniors have also developed the system of the interchange of school correspondence between designated schools in the United States and the schools abroad. This activity is an outstanding feature in the development of a closer understanding between those who later will be called upon to carry public responsibility in their respective countries in years to come.

Mr. LUCE. This statement shows quite clearly that the work of the central office could not well be conducted in less than two of these buildings, and inasmuch as by the time the ink was dry upon the signature to this bill the Red Cross people would have to begin again to get a further extension of time, I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois that there should be such an extension made now. I do not believe that the members of my committee would demur if when the bill is considered this morning I should move to strike out the limitation of one year and make it three years.

Mr. MANN. Personally I have no objection to the language of the Senate resolution providing that in such time as may hereafter be provided by Congress the buildings shall be removed, because I feel very certain that these buildings, or a portion of them, will be needed permanently, and probably ought to remain there until the Red Cross is prepared to put up some better buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe it would be better to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts and limit it to three years more? There is one building, Annex No. 2, a frame building, which in three years from now will be in a more or less dilapidated condition. Annex No. 4 is a rather well-constructed building that may last 10 years, but I believe that Annex No. 2, the one in the rear of the church, will in a couple of years be in a dilapidated condition, and should not be continued there indefinitely by act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Probably that will be removed, and under the Senate resolution it could be removed at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but there is the difficulty of legislative inertia.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of making them come before Congress in order to get an extension for a building which ought to remain there?

Mr. STAFFORD. In my opinion that other building should not remain there. Annex No. 4 might consistently remain, perhaps, five years.

Mr. MANN. We could order it removed whenever we desired.

Mr. STAFFORD. But with the legislative inertia it is not likely to be removed then, and if they should come back in three years we would know the condition of the building.

Mr. MANN. We are experiencing the result of legislative inertia now. Their building is there, although under the act of Congress it should have been removed before this. I do not like to make them violate the law, because they are law-abiding people, I think.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I wish to suggest that if this is postponed for three years, that will carry it to a time when Congress will have a short session.

Mr. MANN. Let us hope so, for we have not had many short sessions lately.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It might be more difficult to get the action of Congress in a short session than during a long session.

Mr. LUCE. I think that, following the practice of the Committee on the Library, on the whole it is more prudent to require affirmative action on the part of Congress than the reverse procedure. Personally, I do not feel strongly at all in the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman intends to offer an amendment to make it three years from date?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by joint resolution of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1917, authority was granted to the American National Red Cross to erect temporary structures upon square No. 172 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government, provided said buildings erected under said authority should be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within such time as may hereafter be provided by Congress; and

Whereas the buildings erected pursuant to said resolution are still needed for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority be and is hereby given to the central committee of the American National Red Cross to continue the use of such temporary buildings as are now erected upon square 172 in the city of Washington, for the use of the American Red Cross in connection with its work in cooperation with the Government of the United States: Provided, That any building or buildings, the use of which is extended under this authority, shall be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within such time as may hereafter be provided by Congress. Provided further, That the United States shall be put to no expense of any kind by reason of the exercise of the authority hereby conferred.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out "within such time as may hereafter be provided by Congress," and in lieu thereof insert the following: "not later than December 31, 1922." Strike out the preamble of the resolution.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

Page 2, line 13, strike out the figures 1922 and insert in lieu thereof the figures 1924.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

STATUE OF JEANNE D'ARC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Jeanne d'Arc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant the Société des Femmes de France à New York permission to erect on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, a copy of the statue of Jeanne d'Arc by Paul Dubois: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the pedestal shall be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

FURNISHING CLOTHING TO EX-SERVICE MEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 221, directing the Secretary of War to furnish clothing to ex-service men while patients in Public Health Service hospitals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he does not think that if this resolution were recommitted to his committee a proper amendment might be put into the measure so as to have it accomplish just what the committee desires to accomplish rather than to leave it as it is now.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment that I would like to have the Clerk read for information, which I propose to offer.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend House joint resolution 221 by striking out everything after the word "assembled," in line 2, and add the following:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon requisition made upon him by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, to furnish all ex-service men of the World War now in the United States Public Health Service hospitals, or who may hereafter be admitted to such hospitals, who are without financial means and who are not receiving compensation, with necessary and suitable clothing and wearing apparel for their comfort while patients in such hospitals receiving treatment or convalescing;

"Such clothing to be furnished out of any reserve material now on hand for the use of the Army, under rules and regulations to be adopted by the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service and the Secretary of War;

"And all clothing and wearing apparel so furnished such patients while retained in such hospitals shall, upon their discharge from such hospitals, become the property of such ex-service men."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Texas indicates very clearly how little consideration this measure must have had in the committee. It was so drawn originally that it is very uncertain who would receive the benefits it proposed. Both of the Government agencies involved, the War Department and the Public Health Service, protested against the legislation, and no one knew how much it might cost. The cost might be trifling or it might run into hundreds of millions. Now, the gentleman from Texas has proposed an amendment changing vitally the character of the bill, and really establishing a new compensation or pension system. Manifestly in the consideration of measures by unanimous consent a matter as involved and uncertain as this can not be considered intelligently. This measure deals with matters that properly relate to the Veterans' Bureau. It is not a War Department matter, and therefore should not be considered by the Military Committee. If there is any feature of aid to ex-soldiers that has not been provided for, it should be referred to the committee having charge of such matters. Therefore, I object to the consideration of this matter at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

SEQUOIA NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7452) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt-Sequoia National Park.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CREDIT FOR MILITARY SERVICE IN THE WORLD WAR.

The next business on the Calendar for Unaimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 180) extending the provisions of the act of February 25, 1919, allowing credit for military service during the war with Germany in homestead entries, and of public resolution No. 29, approved February 14, 1920, allowing a preferred right of entry for at least 60 days after the date of opening in connection with lands opened or restored to entry to citizens of the United States who served with the allied armies during the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt the propriety of extending these special privileges to men who served in the allied armies, however noble that service may have been. As no one seems to want to be heard upon the resolution, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 221.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman at present for that purpose. He should consult the Chair in advance.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2307) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in my opinion this bill is too important to be taken up under the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There are various amendments proposed to the national defense act, and I think it would require the consideration of half an hour or more if we should get into it. It involves a change of policy upon the part of the Government in certain particulars.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to take up the time of the House in arguing with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in regard to the bill. I would be very glad to explain the purpose of the bill, but if the gentleman intends to object, that would be hardly worth while. This bill was given very careful consideration by the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee and by the full committee. The matters which are incorporated in the bill are matters which have been under consideration for something like a year, and they are recommended by the legislative committee of the National Guard Association of the United States, by the Secretary of War, and by the Chief of the Militia Bureau. In my opinion, and in the opinion of these men who have given a careful study to the development and building up of the National Guard these amendments to the national defense act are very important. In fact, they have been insisting on them and claiming that the lack of these amendments is hampering them in their work. The bill, of course, is rather lengthy; but, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] remarked the other day, that is because it is a reenactment of the present legislation, with a few minor changes in each of the paragraphs or sections.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I believe there are six or eight or more amendments affecting the act that are incorporated in the bill.

Mr. CRAGO. There are four.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there are more than four. There are some that I take issue with, particularly in respect to authorizing the hiring of clerks for the property and disbursing officers of the National Guard, work now being performed by the Quartermaster Corps. I think the bill is too important to be considered under unanimous consent, and therefore I object.

FORT FETTERMAN MILITARY RESERVATION, WYO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10002) to extend the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Fetterman Military Reservation, in the State of Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what abandoned lands there are in this fort in Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Fort Fetterman Military Reservation comprises a comparatively small area. At one time there was an Army post there on the overland trail. When the post was abandoned and the lands were opened for settlement, we did what we ordinarily do in such cases. We opened the lands for settlement only under the homestead law, the purpose being to give the homesteader the first opportunity to take the better of the lands, and there are none that are very choice. Applying to the public lands generally there is a law under which after public lands have been surrounded by entered lands for a certain length of time, these isolated tracts being rocky, broken, not valuable for cultivation, may be sold at not less than an appraised price by the Secretary of the Interior in areas not exceeding 160 acres. That general law does not apply to this small area, because the lands were opened to entry not under the general land laws but under the homestead laws. Notwithstanding that fact there were some isolated tracts sold. This bill comes from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the committee, and it proposes to extend the isolated tract law that applies to other public lands in the country of this sort to this comparatively small area of abandoned reservations. It was abandoned over 20 years ago.

Mr. WALSH. So that they might be disposed of?

Mr. MONDELL. They can now be disposed of under the homestead law, but so that the isolated areas within this tract may be sold at auction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in view of the long explanation made by the gentleman from Wyoming of this bill it is very evident to my mind that the matter has been very ill considered in the committee. It is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar now and is not understood even by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I think it has no business on the calendar in that sort of condition. It opens up the great public-land question and is liable to cost millions and millions of dollars to the people of this country. If we can not get a few old clothes for the soldiers, you can not get this bill, and, Mr. Speaker, I object.

POST-OFFICE SITE AT MADISON, WIS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9604) for the acquisition of a post-office site at Madison, Wis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the act of Congress approved September 7, 1916 (39 Stats., p. 742), which authorizes the acquisition of a site and the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post office, United States courts, and other governmental offices in the city of Madison, Wis., at a limit of cost of $550,000, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in said city at a cost of not exceeding $350,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an inquiry or two about the bill if the gentleman will yield. I believe the objection stage is passed. Is this a new project?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. No; it is not. It was first authorized in 1913.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, was it one of the bills which was carried in the omnibus bill of 1913?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. It was. Briefly the history of the project is as follows: In the omnibus bill of 1913 the amount authorized for the construction of a post office and a courthouse at Madison was $550,000. It was subsequently found that the ground was not large enough for the erection of a suitable building. In 1916 I secured by special act an amendment to this project, which provided for the sale of the present Federal building property and the purchase of a suitable site elsewhere in said city.

Pursuant to this authorization the Committee on Appropriations in 1915 appropriated $200,000 for commencement and $15,000 for expenses incidental to the acquisition of temporary quarters. As condemnation proceedings had begun another appropriation of $400,000 was made in 1919, so that there is now available the appropriation of $415,000, out of which some incidental expenses have been incurred.

In 1917 the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported favorably on my bill to increase the limit of cost to $1,050,000. On account of conditions in the Senate, owing to a filibuster, I did not press its passage.

In 1919 in an omnibus bill which passed the House, but did not pass the Senate, the Madison post-office project was increased to $1,075,000.

That, in brief, is the history of the legislation.

It being apparent at this time that no omnibus bill is likely to be enacted, an emergency has arisen. By my personal work, assisted by representative business men of Madison, we were able to find a suitable site only one block away from the capitol square. But on account of the delay the lot owners complained. Some of them wished to erect buildings on the grounds. I persuaded them to be patient and through the active aid of the chamber of commerce and Postmaster Devine options have been obtained on these lots at about $360,000. Condemnation proceedings had been begun, but were abandoned because the price of the lots reached too high a figure. I shall print with my remarks some letters that I have received from Postmaster Devine and also from officials of the Treasury Department. These letters show the nature of this emergency. If we do not purchase these lots now it is likely that the lot owners will erect buildings on them, in which event the site may be lost or cost the Government as much more as these buildings shall be worth:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Madison, Wis., May 27, 1921.

Hon. J. M. NELSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NELSON: It seems like old times again to write you regarding the status of a Federal building for Madison. I would not have written you at this time but for the reason that Mr. A. A. Packard, superintendent of public buildings at Chicago, visited Madison May 25 to investigate conditions regarding the Monona Avenue site, which is generally conceded by all concerned to be the most logical location for the new Federal building.

Mr. Packard suggested that I write you and explain conditions at the present time. On the opposite corner of the proposed site, next to the Orpheum Theater on Monona Avenue, the Beavers' Fraternal Association have started to erect a five-story building, and this no doubt will enhance the value of adjoining property, and it is the opinion of many people that this is the opportune time to purchase the proposed site for the Federal building, as the Government will be able to save many thousands of dollars by purchasing as soon as possible.

Mr. Packard is also of the opinion that the entire block should be secured at this time, and I heartily concur in his opinion. If the 66 feet will be left running along Pinckney Street it will be a detriment and drawback to the new building. I feel satisfied that the entire block can be purchased for $300,000, or a shade under that figure. This amount is very reasonable when the location is considered, and a space of 264 by 330 feet can be secured right in a business district and within a few blocks of the Chicago & Northwestern and Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul East Side stations. About 80 per cent of our mail is received from the Chicago & Northwestern station. The transportation of mail from depots to post office and vice versa is a big factor in determining the location of Federal buildings. The present transfers from Chicago & Northwestern station to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul West Side and Illinois Central stations are made on West Wilson Street, passing the proposed post-office site.

If some arrangement could be made to purchase the site at an early date and the property owners were assured that the Government meant business, I have no doubt that the entire block could be purchased at a very reasonable figure.

It must be remembered also that the valuation of the present old post-office site is increasing in value, and no doubt when the time comes will bring at least $250,000. When this amount is considered, the new site will not cost the Government a great sum of money even though the entire block is acquired.

I know, as every Madisonian knows, that you will be on the job and do everything you properly can to secure the purchase of a site and Federal building for Madison.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. A. DEVINE, Postmaster.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Madison, Wis., October 13, 1921.

Hon. J. M. NELSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NELSON: Referring further to my letter to you under date of May 27, 1921, I beg to inform you that on the strength of a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury by Mr. A. A. Packard, superintendent of public buildings, Chicago, Ill., who was sent to Madison May 25 to confer with me regarding the possibility of securing the Monona Avenue property for a post office site.

On June 9, 1921, I received the following letter from Mr. J. H. Moyle, Assistant Secretary, Treasury Department:

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1921.

THE POSTMASTER, Madison, Wis.

SIR: Reference is made to the matter of the acquisition of a new Federal building site in your city, and to the recent investigation of conditions relative thereto by Supervising Superintendent Packard, of this department.

It appears from his report that the owners of the site which the department attempted to acquire by condemnation proceedings are now willing to dispose of their land by voluntary conveyance if the department would take action within a reasonable time. It is also understood from his report that the entire block bounded by Pinckney Street on the north, Wilson Street on the east, Monona Avenue on the south, and Doty Street on the west may be obtained at an amount which the Government is justified in paying.

Will you please communicate with the owners of the above block and request them to submit proposals for the sale of their land upon the inclosed forms. This site matter has been pending for some time, and the department is anxious to take definite action regarding same if proposals for the sale of the land desired are submitted to which the department can give consideration.

Your prompt attention to this matter will be appreciated.

Respectfully,

J. H. MOYLE, Assistant Secretary.

I immediately called in the property owners of the entire block bounded by Pinckey Street on the north, Wilson Street on the east, Monona Avenue on the south, and Doty Street on the west, as it was the intention and was so recommended by Mr. Packard to secure the entire block, and I secured what I considered very reasonable proposals from the owners in said block and submitted them to the Treasury Department July 19, 1921. On August 26 I submitted a new proposal from Mr. Edward James Fisher, the present owner, for at the time he had given an option on said property to another man, and the option expired. In reply to my letter of above date I received a letter from the Assistant Secretary stating that the proposal would be placed with the other papers in the case, and that the department was now giving consideration to the matter.

It was the intention, as I understand it, to purchase the site with the original appropriation of $550,000 without waiting for an additional appropriation which would take some time. The property owners are getting anxious to know what the Treasury Department intends to do in regard to the matter. The property is increasing in value right along, and if it could be purchased at the price for which I received proposals, $336,448, I feel satisfied that the Government would be saving many thousands of dollars, for I am sure within a few years this block will be worth at least $500,000. Therefore I sincerely hope you will make every possible effort to have the site purchased at an early date.

Very sincerely yours,

W. A. DEVINE, Postmaster.

We have secured options on these lots at a cost not to exceed $336,000, which is considered to be a very reasonable price. Indeed, I am assured by Mr. Don E. Mowry, secretary of the chamber of commerce, and by Postmaster Devine that these lots probably are worth $500,000. I attribute this favorable proposition not only to the activity of members of the chamber of commerce but also to the public spirit of the citizens of Madison.

I have been very fortunate in having the cooperation of the Acting Supervising Architect, and before I introduced my bill I secured the assurance of the Treasury Department that the funds necessary would be applied at once for the purchase of this site. I received that assurance in the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, October 13, 1921.

Hon. J. M. NELSON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Reference is made to your call at the department relative to the acquisition of a new Federal building site at Madison, Wis., and particularly to your inquiry as to what would be the attitude of the department if legislation could be passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site without regard as to whether the balance of the appropriation remaining was sufficient for the erection of a building, leaving that question for future legislation.

The existing legislation for this project authorizes a site and building at a limit of cost of $550,000. Of this amount $415,000 has been appropriated.

If a bill is introduced in Congress by you and forwarded here for consideration, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site at Madison, Wis., and the appropriations heretofore made for site and building are made available for the acquisition of a site only, said bill will be reported upon favorably.

Very truly, yours,

EDWARD CLIFFORD,
Assistant Secretary.

I was also greatly assisted by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, before which I appeared several times. The committee instructed the chairman to ascertain from the Treasury Department its attitude as to my bill and also whether or not a favorable report on my project would involve the committee in a charge of partiality to me. In reply to the inquiry the Treasury Department replied as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 10, 1922.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Reference is made to your request of January 14, 1922, for a recommendation in regard to the above-mentioned bill, which provides that the act of September 7, 1916, authorizing the acquisition of a site and erection of a post-office building thereon at Madison, Wis., at a limit of cost of $550,000, be amended so as to authorize the acquisition of a site at a limit of cost not to exceed $350,000.

Following the enactment of the legislation above referred to an effort was made to obtain a site in the city of Madison at a price that would leave a sufficient amount under the limit for the construction of the building, but without success. On account of the location of the city on a narrow strip of land between two lakes building sites are limited and the prices consequently high. The opinion of the local officials, as well as that of the department representatives sent to investigate the situation, is that prices will advance, and, owing to the rapid growth of the city, there will be increasing difficulty in obtaining a site suitable as to size and location for a Government building.

In view of the situation it would appear very much to the advantage of the Government to take prompt steps to obtain a site in this city, therefore it is recommended that the proposed bill be enacted into law at an early date, the amount of $350,000 being considered sufficient to purchase the necessary land.

Information as to places where conditions may be similar to those at Madison, requested in the last paragraph of your letter, will form the subject of a separate communication.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 16, 1922.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring further to your letter of the 14th ultimo, in which you request a report on H. R. 9604, a bill for the acquisition of a post-office site at Madison, Wis.; also requesting a statement showing the number of propositions of a similar nature now pending before the department, I have the honor to inform you that, so far as this department is aware, there are no other similar cases.

A report upon the Madison project was submitted to your committee on the 10th instant.

Respectfully,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

Thereupon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds unanimously recommended the bill. I then had it placed upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar, believing that no Member of the House would oppose its consideration. In that belief I have not been disappointed.

The passage of this bill, Mr. Speaker, will relieve me from considerable anxiety, for I have given a great deal of attention to this project. I would not like to lose or endanger this very suitable site. It will also be of great satisfaction to many leading business men of my city, who have cooperated with me in locating the site and securing these lots. But it will especially be profitable for the Government. It secures this building at something like $150,000 less than its real value; and by acquiring it now, it avoids the necessity of the purchase of new buildings, which might add $100,000 or $150,000 to the final cost.

Having secured the site, I shall, of course, await the passage of an omnibus bill before I ask for the funds with which to construct the post-office and courthouse building, which must be in keeping with the setting of our beautiful capital city.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. J. M. NELSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK, CALIFORNIA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5588) to repeal section 5 of an act entitled "An act to establish the Lassen Volcanic National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, in the State of California, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1916.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when we passed the act for the creation of this park, I believe, several years ago, the bill as reported to the House or as introduced in the House had a limit of cost on the appropriation of $10,000 annually. The bill was introduced, I think, by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and the Committee on Public Lands, of which he was a member, reported an amendment reducing the amount of the annual appropriation from $10,000 to $5,000, and with that amendment the bill passed. First it was purposed to have a limit of $10,000, which was reduced by the committee and Congress to $5,000. Now it is proposed to take the limit off altogether. Is that statement correct, may I ask the gentleman from California?

Mr. RAKER. In greater part.

Mr. MANN. What part was not correct?

Mr. RAKER. I will say we were compelled to do this by the attitude of gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations. They did the same thing in regard to the Rocky Mountain National Park, and to get the legislation through we had to do that. It just tied us up.

Mr. MANN. When the Rocky Mountain Park bill was up before the House it is true the committee reported a limitation of a small amount. It was also true I warned them at the time that it ought not to be done. It is also true that since then they have removed the limitation.

Mr. RAKER. The Rocky Mountain Park bill went through first. To get it through the amendment was suggested. Now people all over the northern part of the State are using every endeavor on earth to develop this park, and they can not do it with this restriction.

Mr. MANN. Well, does it not seem a little odd that the original proposer of the park should say that he would be satisfied with the appropriation of $10,000 a year and put a limitation in to that effect and then report the bill with a limitation in it reduced to $5,000 a year, and then when the bill becomes a law it is proposed to remove the limitation entirely? Is not that a little odd?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield? I was compelled to do that by the statement of gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations. Our people wanted the bill put through, and I thought I could let it go a couple of years——

Mr. MANN. This bill did not come from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. But the Committee on Appropriations were standing ready to object. Mr. TAYLOR had to amend his bill, and I was in the same fix and I said, "Let the bill go through, and in the next Congress or two we may come back and get the limitation off."

Mr. MANN. That is sort of working a confidence game either on the Congress or on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RAKER. It is not exactly. I think it was public spirited.

Mr. MANN. It is a sort of confidence game.

Mr. RAKER. I should call it public-spirited legislation; I know it is.

Mr. MANN. Putting the limitation on was public spirited.

Mr. RAKER. No; because we were compelled to do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, it seems that way to me.

Mr. RAKER. Well, it was only in order to get it through.

Mr. MANN. If the committee consented to make an agreement, to pass the bill with the limitation in it and makes an agreement to pass the bill with that limitation in it, and as soon as it is passed it is proposed to revoke the agreement, that is what I call reneging.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there? They had us squeezed so we could not help ourselves.

Mr. MANN. This agreement only lasted a very few years.

Mr. RAKER. About two years.

Mr. MANN. It was to be binding only on one side——

Mr. RAKER. It was never intended to be binding——

Mr. MANN. Only on one side.

Mr. RAKER. That is all.

Mr. GARNER. The limitation ran out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to establish the Lassen Volcanic National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, in the State of California, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1916, which is in the words and figures following:

"SEC. 5. That no appropriation for the maintenance, supervision, or improvement of said park in excess of $5,000 annually shall be made, unless the same shall have first been expressly authorized by law," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all of line 6, page 1, after the figures "1916," lines 7, 8, 9, and all of lines 1 and 2, page 2, and insert "(Thirty-ninth Statutes at Large, page 442)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LANDS IN COCONINO COUNTY, ARIZ.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2471) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof," approved July 28, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 558).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire as to this measure, what is the need of the last sentence as found in the act, granting the privilege to purchase this land at $1.25 per acre?

Mr. MANN. That is a customary provision where land is thrown open for settlement in this way.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the land not covered by the valid applications. It is really a sale of isolated parks.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the law, when there is a sale of isolated parks they are put up at auction?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here you do not do that, but enable them to be sold at a limited price—to be entered on at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking why you make an exception to the general law in this particular?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think that was in the original act.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that was in the original act. The only amendment in this bill from the existing law is striking out "twenty" and inserting "eighty," and leaving off the letter "s" on "applications."

Mr. STAFFORD. I was anxious to know why the original law did not apply, so as to have the disjointed tracts put up at public auction and sold at the price they would bring at auction.

Mr. SINNOTT. The land would have to be isolated for two years before it could be sold under the isolated tract law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2471) to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof," approved July 28, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 558).

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the survey and sale of certain lands in Coconino County, Ariz., to the occupants thereof," approved July 28, 1914 (38 Stat. L., p. 558), is amended to reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. That any person, or his successors in interest, who prior to January 1, 1914, were in the actual occupancy of and improving one or more of said tracts for agricultural purposes, not exceeding in all 80 acres, and have maintained the same in good faith for said purposes, upon the filing of an application to enter the same within six months from the filing of the plat of said survey in the local land office, shall be entitled to a patent for such tract or tracts upon paying the sum of $1.25 per acre therefor. All such tracts not covered by valid application at the expiration of said six months shall thereafter be subject to cash entry upon payment of $1.25 per acre."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE FOR ADJUSTMENT OF PAY, ARMY AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker appoints as the committee, under the resolution passed last week, for the adjustment of pay of the Army and Navy Departments:

Mr. MCKENZIE, Mr. TILSON, Mr. KRAUS, Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and Mr. OLIVER.

CONFLICTING LAND CLAIMS IN MOHAVE COUNTY, ARIZ.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9257) to permit adjustment of conflicting claims to certain lands in Mohave County, Ariz.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9257) to permit adjustment of conflicting claims to certain lands in Mohave County, Ariz.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to accept a relinquishment from the owners of the odd-numbered sections of land falling within townships 16, 16½, and 17 north, of range 13 west, Arizona, and permit said owners to select and receive in exchange therefor patents of an equal area of vacant surveyed, nonmineral, nontimbered public land of the United States in the county of Mohave, State of Arizona.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Line 4, after the word "empowered," insert "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TIMBER-CUTTING RIGHTS, NATIONAL FOREST, ARIZONA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7812) to extend the time for cutting timber in the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, Ariz.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what is the need of extending for so long the privilege to this private timber company of the right of cutting timber on lands on which the privilege expires in 1925?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is aware that only six sections of land are involved in this bill, a comparatively small area, and that the Arizona Lumber & Timber Co. is engaged in very large logging and sawmill operations in the national forests in my State. This bill is practically a duplicate of a bill passed in 1918 for the benefit of the Saginaw & Manistee Lumber Co., of Williams, Ariz., whose timber holdings were in the Tusayan National Forest. If the Arizona Lumber & Timber Co. is compelled to cut its timber on these six sections of land before December 31, 1925, it will be necessary to immediately build a line of logging railroad and to leave the timber on the intermediate sections of Government land uncut. The company is buying timber from the United States, and the timber on these sections can be handled in a more satisfactory manner if its cutting is continued to some future time as provided in this bill. The Forest Service is thoroughly satisfied that the term be extended to 1950.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are we to understand that on all the other sections of land than these sections the Government is going to have the right to the growing timber from this time on?

Mr. HAYDEN. Absolutely. The Forest Service will have the right to regulate the cutting, so that a seed tree will be left on each acre, and the tops and waste will be gathered up and burned in order to protect the forest against fire. All of the logging operations will be carried on as required by the Forest Service elsewhere, which is a real advantage to the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the past few years they have asked a liberal extension of 25 years, when before they only asked for 10 years.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman should understand that this company will in all probability continue its lumbering operations much longer than the next 25 years. In a letter written to me Mr. T. A. Riordan, president of the Arizona Lumber & Timber Co., makes the following statement:

The basis upon which the extension is asked has been thoroughly discussed with the Forestry Department. The extension will be of advantage to us, since it will not force us to build considerable trackage to secure this timber within the time limit, and which track would be useless at this time for the handling of any other timber, while with the extension granted us the timber can be cut when we are cutting adjoining timber, and, consequently, with a great saving in the matter of railway and other operating costs. In exchange for this extension we are giving the Forestry Department a very liberal consideration in the way of relinquishment of rights that we hold on certain lands reconveyed to the United States, the leaving of additional seed trees other than those stipulated in our present contract, and advantages in respect to the disposal of brush and waste, all of which considerations in favor of the Forestry Department were proposed by the department itself and agreed to by us. There is a well-defined consideration between the parties to the agreement, as we have no doubt you will find confirmed upon inquiry at the Forestry office.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7812) to extend the time for cutting timber in the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, Ariz.

Be it enacted, etc., That the rights of the Arizona Lumber & Timber Co. and its successors in interest to cut and remove the timber from such of the lands within the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, Ariz., as have been reconveyed, or are under contract to be reconveyed, to the United States, subject to outstanding timber-right contracts held by said company under the rules, regulations, and conditions imposed by the Secretary of the Interior at the time of said reconveyance or contract to reconvey, are hereby extended to and until December 31, 1950: Provided, That said company executes and enters into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture to comply with such additional requirements as may be mutually agreed upon to promote forest-fire protection, reforestation, and forestry administration: Provided further, That all its rights to cut and remove timber from any lands within said national forests are to terminate on the 31st day of December, 1950, but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company any rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyance, and in the absence of the execution of such an agreement this act shall neither extend nor restrict the present rights of said company.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to extend the rights of the Arizona Lumber & Timber Co. and its successors in interest to cut and remove the timber from such of the following-described lands: Sections 3 and 9, township 19, north, range 5 east; section 33, township 20 north, range 5 east; section 31, township 21 north, range 5 east; section 35, township 20 north, range 6 east; section 31, township 20 north, range 7 east; all of the Gila and Salt River principal base and meridian, within the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, Ariz., as have been reconveyed, or are under contract to be reconveyed, to the United States, subject to outstanding timber-right contracts held by said company under the rules, regulations, and conditions imposed by the Secretary of the Interior at the time of said reconveyance or contract to reconvey until such time as he may determine to be in the public interest, but not later than December 31, 1950: Provided, That said company executes and enters into an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture to comply with such additional requirements upon the above-described lands and any other lands for which timber rights are claimed by said company within the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, as may be mutually agreed upon to promote forest-fire protection, reforestation, and forestry administration: Provided further, That all of its present rights to cut and remove timber from any lands within said national forests are to terminate on the date fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture and agreed to by the company; but this act shall not be construed to confer upon said company rights in addition to those held by the company at the time of said reconveyances, and in the absence of the execution of such an agreement this act shall neither extend nor restrict the present rights of said company."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsidered the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 27, 1922.

Hon. F. H. GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have this day transmitted to Gov. Miller, of New York, my resignation, to take place at midnight, February 28, 1922.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. HOUGHTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

SITE FOR ADMINISTRATION BUILDING, ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8675) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept a certain tract of land donated as a site for an administration building for the Rocky Mountain National Park.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to authorize the acceptance as a gift of the title to property upon which an administration building would be erected, with the provision that the gift is not to be effective unless the administration building is constructed by December 31, 1923.

Mr. VAILE. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. That is, during the year after the close of this fiscal year?

Mr. VAILE. That is right.

Mr. MANN. There is no proposition for an appropriation pending now that would authorize the construction of this administration building?

Mr. VAILE. That is also correct.

Mr. MANN. I doubt very much whether it would be possible, if a Government appropriation were made next year, to construct the building within six months' time.

Mr. VAILE. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: The building which is now being used for administration purposes is a small frame building, not over 25 feet wide. Of course, we hope that a two-story building, perhaps of brick or stone, could be constructed; not an expensive building but a building which would be ample for the purposes of administration of that park.

It need not be a very expensive building. I presume it could be built within six months.

Mr. MANN. Not as Government work goes. It is time enough to accept title when we determine to erect the building.

Mr. VAILE. I think we can accept title now. That does not impose any immediate obligation upon us. It is not the intention to put up an expensive building, but simply a small one sufficient for the purpose. We are now renting a small frame building there at $50 a month. These ladies have volunteered to donate a lot. It is centrally located.

Mr. MANN. Very likely; but I do not like to do things under compulsion. The gentleman from Colorado knows, and everybody else knows, that if you accept title to a piece of land with the agreement that the Government shall erect a building by December 31, 1923, then you will insist that we must construct the building within that time, whether we want to or not.

Mr. VAILE. Of course, I expect to urge the Committee on Appropriations to erect a small building there. It will be a saving to the Government. There are not many buildings in that village. We are now paying rent for the present administration building at a rather high rate of rent.

Mr. MANN. Yes. That is a case where they soak the Government. I can not see any warrant for this.

Mr. VAILE. If we do not put up the building, of course then our action is nugatory to-day. The lot will revert, or else we would have to ask these ladies to donate it again.

Mr. MANN. We can not put up the building within the next fiscal year unless it is the intention of the gentleman to go before the Senate committee, and I do not know but that it is too late for that. If an appropriation is not carried for this building in the appropriation bill under the Interior Department they can not get it. You can not get the appropriation for the next fiscal year unless the item passes the Senate. What is the hurry about getting title to property on an offer that soon runs out?

Mr. VAILE. The suggestion the gentleman makes in regard to the Senate was not brought to my attention. I did not think of that, as the appropriation bill had already been acted upon by the House.

Mr. MANN. It is too late now.

Mr. VAILE. This is a generous offer.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is such a generous offer to say that they will give title limited to a certain time when we shall not be able to put up the building within that time.

Mr. VAILE. If the gentleman wants to move an amendment to have the time extended and have the gift extended on those conditions, I shall not object.

Mr. MANN. You can not do that. That is in the deed.

Mr. VAILE. We can say to these ladies that we will accept if they extend it; otherwise we will not accept it. If the gentleman wants to make it a year later, that is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. MANN. That is not in the bill.

Mr. VAILE. But we will accept it on these conditions.

Mr. MANN. Let it go over until you figure that out.

Mr. VAILE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I present a privileged report, it being a report on the bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota reports a bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina reserves all points of order on the bill. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

COMMISSIONING OF MIDSHIPMEN IN THE MARINE CORPS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. J. Res. 274) authorizing the commissioning in the Marine Corps of midshipmen under certain conditions.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the House joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any midshipman of the United States Naval Academy who has heretofore failed to graduate therefrom and who shall have served honorably in the Marine Corps for a period of one year, and who has passed satisfactorily the examination for appointment as a commissioned officer of the Marine Corps, may be commissioned prior to the graduation of the class at the Naval Academy of which he was a member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CERTAIN APACHE INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6512) for the relief of and purchase of lands for certain of the Apache Indians of Oklahoma lately confined as prisoners of war at Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does it not seem like a rather large amount to appropriate $42,500 for the benefit of 13 people because they were prisoners of the United States?

Mr. ROACH. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the $42,500 carried in this bill was the estimate submitted to our committee by the Secretary of the Interior, and it is our information that there were some 85 Indians who were held as prisoners of war at Fort Sill, and that upon their discharge and removal from Fort Sill there was an agreement or understanding that they were to be given certain land allotments and given rations for one year, and that all of these Indians, except the 13 for whom this bill undertakes to provide, were given land allotments and were furnished the rations provided for under that agreement. It seems that the Interior Department looks upon this agreement to supply these 13 Indians, 12 of whom are minors, with these land allotments and rations, that were promised them, as a sacred obligation.

Mr. MANN. Where do they say it is a sacred obligation?

Mr. ROACH. In the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to our committee, if the gentleman cares to read it, it is stated that they regard it as a sacred obligation to fulfill this promise. But the point is this: Whether they so regard it as a sacred obligation or not, if the agreement was made it should be carried out.

Mr. MANN. There was no agreement made by any authority.

Mr. ROACH. Apparently there must have been some understanding with these Indians that they were to be furnished land allotments and these rations. At any rate, the Government has given these things to all of them except the 13, and inasmuch as that has been done for all the others it would seem only fair and just that these 13 should be similarly treated.

Mr. MANN. A lot of these Apache Indians were taken as prisoners of war. They were confined—and the word "confined" should have a question mark after it—theoretically confined at Fort Sill for many years, living off the Government during that time. Then the Government authorized them to leave and to take certain lands.

I believe most of them did. I think some of them refused to go on those lands, although my recollection is a little bit hazy on that subject. Now, there is one of these adults left who has 12 minor children, and it is proposed to give to each of them nearly $2,500, because they were prisoners of war and because they were supported by the Government for many years, without any expense to them. As for this talk about an agreement, I do not know what some agent of the Indian Office may have promised them, except as stated here. Whatever promises were made were without authority, and, I assume, without authority from the War Department. This is quite a sum of money to appropriate for 1 adult and 12 minor children just because they were prisoners. To an ordinary prisoner we give a suit of clothes and railroad fare to take him some place—not very much, and not a very expensive suit of clothes.

Mr. ROACH. I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts leading up to the allotments made to these 85 Indians to be able to state what the agreement was, but if there was any justice and merit in alloting to them land and rations, which was evidently done, then certainly Congress is justified in seeing that the remainder receive equally fair treatment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we supposed we had settled the whole thing years ago. This matter has been pending around Congress for years, and we supposed it was settled a number of years ago.

Mr. ROACH. I will state to the gentleman for his information that other appropriations similar to this have been made, and the allotments have been made and the rations furnished to the other Indians who were held as prisoners at Fort Sill, and they were not made to these Indians because the appropriations were exhausted before they got to them.

Mr. MANN. It may be that we have appropriated money heretofore, and the department, entirely disregarding the will of Congress limiting the amount, has gone ahead and spent the money for a part of the service to be performed instead of for the whole of the service. That would be very much like the administration which has frequently prevailed in the Indian Office.

Mr. ROACH. I am not so well informed on the history of these Indians and their rights or the agreement made by the Government with them as my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN], to whom I now yield.

Mr. MANN. I have been making these remarks for the purpose of trying to get a rise out of the gentleman from Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. My idea about this matter was very similar to that stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]; but we had the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs before us and we had the report of the Interior Department, and it is a fact that they insist that there was an agreement made originally whereby these Indians are now entitled to this consideration at the hands of the Government.

Mr. MANN. An agreement for what? The Indians were prisoners of war. To say that we had to pay them $2,000 or $3,000 each to discharge them is ridiculous.

Mr. SNYDER. The Bureau of Indian Affairs maintain that these other Indians were allotted lands and that this money will be spent directly to buy a farm for each one of these minors.

Mr. MANN. Which he will not cultivate and can not lease and can not dispose of.

Mr. SNYDER. I appreciate that, and if the gentleman will read the testimony he will see that my statement was practically the same as that which he is making now; but I was finally convinced that the matter ought to go to a subcommittee, and I appointed these gentlemen on that subcommittee, and they made an investigation, and they are making the best argument that they can for the measure.

Mr. ROACH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN].

Mr. GENSMAN. To begin with, there were about 100 Indians, and the rest of them have received their part under an absolute contract with the agent or the proper authority. They have all received their money except these 13. This does not only apply to allotments, but at the time these Indians were sent down to the Mescalero Reservation it was agreed that they were to be given $144 each in lieu of a year's rations. None has ever been paid to these.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. GENSMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The fact is that these Indians were prisoners of war, were they not?

Mr. GENSMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. With no rights whatever so far as the land itself was concerned. But in order to get rid of them somebody promised them something. They would not go, they liked to be prisoners of war; but the Government was not obliged to keep them as prisoners of war. Thereupon an agent made an agreement to pay them a sum of money if they would accept a dismissal from confinement.

Mr. GENSMAN. The gentleman does not take the right view of it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have been all through this several times.

Mr. GENSMAN. But the gentleman has not been around with the Apaches as much as I have.

Mr. MANN. That may be.

Mr. GENSMAN. The Indians were originally captured down at the Adobe Walls, and they wanted to go back there, and the Government had the Indians on their hands and was responsible for them.

Mr. MANN. While they kept them as prisoners of war.

Mr. GENSMAN. Yes. The Government wanted to send them back to Arizona to the Adobe Walls and get rid of them, and the Government was very fortunate to get rid of them.

Mr. MANN. Did not some of them refuse to go?

Mr. GENSMAN. Yes; 13. I do not blame them for not wanting to leave Oklahoma and go to Arizona. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not blame any Indians who have received their support from the Government, who are theoretically prisoners of war and do not want to go to work. There are a good many white prisoners who do not want to go to work, but we do not pay them money.

Mr. GENSMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the idea that these Indians did not do anything. That is not correct. They had large fields on the reservation, large herds of cattle, and, really, the Apache Indians are the most industrious of all the Indians. They come from a country where they had to farm.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield? These are not the people who were held as prisoners of war; they have all passed away except one. If there was an agreement made with the old people, the heirs are entitled to this consideration, or to some consideration. That is why I listened to the argument on the proposition. If we held the Indians in jail——

Mr. MANN. They were never in jail; they were theoretically prisoners of war. Perhaps the Government was under some obligation to them after they took them prisoners of war. But does any gentleman on the committee think that if we pass this appropriation that that will end it?

Mr. GENSMAN. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. This matter has been before Congress in various forms many years. I came here before they got out of the theoretical confinement.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not think there is any possible way that you can fix it so as to end all these propositions.

Mr. MANN. The trouble with the department or the Indian Office is that it does not close up anything. Even the gentleman from New York was not here before, but the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Missouri were not familiar with the history of this. Well, after we are all gone they will come here and say that we ought to carry out the obligations we owe them, and we must do that for these Indians; we must do this for these Indians.

Mr. SNYDER. I want the gentleman to know that so far as I am personally concerned as chairman of the committee there never has been any bill soft pedaled out of the committee. They have always had to have some merit.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from New York makes a mighty good chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SNYDER. I am not fishing for compliments, but that is the fact.

Mr. MANN. We all know perfectly well that the committee acted on the recommendation of the Indian Office. The committee does not know anything about it except the information they get from the Indian Office.

Mr. SNYDER. The only thing we acted on was the information we got from that source. None of these people are living. We got most of our information from the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN]; that is, our real, authentic information.

Mr. MANN. I have a good deal of confidence in information furnished by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to continue relief to the Apache Indians of Oklahoma lately confined as prisoners of war at Fort Sill Military Reservation, for their subsistence and for the purchase of lands for their settlement thereon, to be selected for them by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War; and there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $42,500 for said purpose, to be immediately available and to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War may prescribe.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "and directed."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GENSMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSOLIDATING NATIONAL FOREST LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 490) to consolidate national forest lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill read for information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for information.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, when the public interests will be benefited thereby, the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the exterior boundaries of the national forests which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may patent not to exceed an equal value of such national forest land, surveyed and nonmineral in character, or the Secretary of Agriculture may authorize the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber within the national forests of the same State, the values in each case to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the contemplated exchange reciting the lands involved shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be accepted, and in some like newspaper published in any county in which may be situated any lands or timber to be given in such exchange. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests, and under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the national forest in which they are located.

With the following committee amendments.

Page 1, line 10, after the word "land," insert the words "in the same State."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "published," insert the words "without expense to the United States."

Page 2, line 17, strike out the words "in which" and insert in lieu thereof the words "within whose exterior boundaries."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, with the passage of this act are we to understand that Congress will be relieved of the consideration of various bills we have had up in the recent past for the taking over of privately cut-over lands and exchanging them for Government-owned lands in the national forests?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. We will be relieved of all the usual exchange bills, the terms of which are confined to the lands within the exterior boundaries of the national forests. Of course, bills may be reported hereafter where it is important to add outside lands to national forests or bills containing special features dealing with outside lands. This has nothing to do with the lands outside of national forests, except lands technically outside but within the exterior boundaries of the forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill has been pending before the committee for many months past, while the committee has been reporting separate bills. What was the occasion for the change of heart on the part of the committee in bringing in this general legislation and saving the time of Congress in passing separate bills?

Mr. SINNOTT. If it is permissible to state committee matters on the floor of the House, we desired to give the matter very full consideration, and some members of the committee were opposed to the ordinary exchange bill applying to all the national forests. After full consideration some of the members of the committee opposed to such legislation withdrew their opposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. One effect of this possibly may be to dispense with the veto of a particular bill where a delegation from a certain State changed their views on the advisability of the legislation.

Mr. SINNOTT. That was an entirely different bill from this bill. That bill embraced public lands on the outside of national forests.

Mr. WALSH. But it was an exchange bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. But controversy arose regarding the outside lands.

Mr. WALSH. This limits it to the exterior boundaries?

Mr. SINNOTT. To lands within the exterior boundaries of the forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who has to pay for the advertising in the restricted amendment which the committee has recommended?

Mr. SINNOTT. The private landowner pays for that. He does that now. Really this is writing into the law what they do to-day in all these exchanges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the provisions of the bill which require that timber that may be given in exchange shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to national forests? Can the gentleman briefly tell us what that means in practice? It seems to me that the timber provision here is the important feature of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under the rules and regulations of the Forest Service only timber of a certain size may be cut, and it has to be cut in a certain way, and the tops and the branches must be piled up so as to not to become a fire menace.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has it been found in practice that that is a sufficient requirement in order to protect the interest of the Government?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is found to be a very great protection to the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the bill.

The Clerk reported the first committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "land" insert the words "in the same State."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a number of bills have been reported out by the committee relating to exchange of national forest lands. A number have been passed by the House and some by the Senate. Some have already been signed by the President. Most of the separate exchange bills that have passed contain a different provision than the one in this general bill. Some allow lands to be exchanged within 6 miles of the exterior boundaries of the land, and some not so much, and some specify other particular conditions. Of course, those special provisions will not be changed by the passage of this present proposed legislation, because the provision in this proposed general law is not in conflict with the provisions in the separate bill. The special bills that we have already passed, so far as the different character of exchange allowed is concerned, will not be affected by this bill.

This bill has several important features. First, the one suggested, "within the same State." Some have been "within the same forest." The next, "expense to be borne by the private owner," and, third, "when the land exchanged is in the forest it should become a part of the forest." While all this legislation was before the committee, general legislation, I felt then and I feel now that a general bill is inadvisable. Of course, it covers the principle of exchange. The question that it takes the time of Congress to pass private bills ought not to be considered as affecting the general welfare of the Government. I just say this now in advance. The land that is now owned by private individuals is something over 25,000,000 acres. If each individual bill came up to be considered you get a perspective of the value of the exchange from the private individual; but now, with the general legislation going through, it will double and quadruple the privately owned land in value, and for which the Government will have to exchange what it receives from the private owner.

I simply judge from what I have seen in the past, and I am afraid that will be the effect in the future. Personally, I have several bills for California. They are suspended pending adjustment of affairs at home. We want to arrange for proper compensation from the Federal Government. The subject has been gone into with the private owners before the department would consider the question of reporting on the bills. I trust the matter will be arranged some way with the people in the counties in which the land is located and in which the particular national forest is located. The people are very intent and fearful that they are going to lose a large proportion of their revenues, and their thought is that if the exchange is permitted, there should be a general law covering or authorizing or directing compensation to the county in which the land is exchanged by reason of the fact that they lose their revenue upon this land. This general exchange bill will authorize the exchanges of lands within the national forests, but no privately owned lands lying without the exterior boundaries of the national forests. Just compensation should be made to the counties in which the national forest is located. Of course, that is met by the argument that if it is an equal exchange of land, the land obtained will pay its taxes, but upon the timber the most of it will be disposed of before the tax collector can get at it, and therefore they will lose the amount of taxes that would otherwise be theirs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I would ask for five minutes more; I will not take more time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Under the present law there is 10 per cent for general administration paid out of the receipts from the sale of timber and permits of the national forest and 25 per cent of it goes to the various States, to be divided by the States in turn to the counties in which the forests are located, for public roads, school purposes, and so forth. And it clearly does not meet the contention that these people in the counties, who pay taxes for the upkeep of the civil government of the county, for the protection of Federal Government public property, are not paid a sufficient amount in return, and they place it on these grounds, and there is a good deal to it and there is real justice in it, that if the Government of the United States through its representatives believes in having a national forest for the purpose of maintaining a timber supply in the future for the Governmnt generally, the General Government should step in and pay its proportion of the taxes to the county in which the national forest is located because there are some counties of which practically half of the entire county is within the national forest; so the more you add to the national forest of necessity the less taxes will be paid to the county to pay its administrative functions and keep up its public duties to its citizens, the maintenance of order, and so forth. Just how and by what method they can obtain this compensation, this just payment on behalf of the Government for its property, is not as easy as it might be. It must be provided for by the Congress. It seems as though it will be the law. This bill will no doubt pass, and we must hereafter provide for the tax or compensation feature above stated. Congress seems to be inclined to put a blanket legislation through rather than to take a little time as each particular matter comes up and dispose of it. I think it is——

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. What does the gentleman contemplate doing with this bill to exchange of lands in the Tahoe Reservation with this committee amendment, page 1, line 10, "in the same State," inserted in this bill? Does the gentleman decide not to press the bill?

Mr. RAKER. I will press them as far as I can, but here is the situation. The people in the community where these forests are located are in favor of exchanges, but they want the counties properly compensated for caring for the National Government property when it is for all the people. They say they want to be given time to fully present their side of the case. They want me to assist in legislation to compensate the counties. I am with them on that, and I am going to do my best to see the Government pays its proportion of taxes to the county by reason of the large extent of national forest lands, which are for the benefit of all people of the United States. No one county or no one State should bear the burden which in justice should be borne by all. I was in hopes that there would be an opportunity to amend this bill so as to place such legislation upon it. But under the rules of the House it is not in order, and then again it being a question of such large proportions. It has not had the consideration of the proper committee of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Under the permission given me by the House to extend my remarks, I will insert here certain correspondence regarding this matter.

I feel it is of that importance as to justify the inserting in the RECORD of such correspondence as directly relates to the question presented.

The Chamber of Commerce of Placerville, Calif., through its committee, Jos. Scherrer, chairman, and Hon. C. E. Hand, secretary, under date of December 30, 1921, present their views as follows:

EL DORADO NATIONAL FOREST EXCHANGE BILL.

PLACERVILLE, December 30, 1921.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RAKER: In the Bee of Saturday, December 24, 1921, under the heading, "Early action expected on land-exchange bills," there appeared two articles, one written by Leo A. McClatchy under a Washington date, and the other a statement issued by the district forester at San Francisco. Mr. McClatchy states that "Early action is expected in the House on the four bills of Representative JOHN E. RAKER, authorizing the Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior to make exchange for privately owned lands within the Shasta, Plumas, El Dorado, and Tahoe National Forests in California."

The district forester in his statement on the subject announces the policy of the Government as follows: Our first energies should be directed toward acquiring lands which are already within the national forest boundaries and are chiefly valuable for timber production and watershed protection, etc.

Secondly, our energies should be directed to a logical rounding out of present forest units. It is a fact that our present boundaries are in many cases unsatisfactory, many irregularities being made for the sole purpose of excluding private lands at the borders of the forests where the excluded areas are absolutely forest lands. It is extremely desirable to acquire them and reform our boundaries along permanent physical lines.

The forest service was consulted in drawing the boundaries of the various bills introduced, and that the boundaries of the forests mentioned do not now include areas of fine timber-producing lands which should ultimately be in public ownership, and it is hoped that through land-exchange legislation that they may be gradually acquired.

The matter was brought to the attention of the El Dorado County Chamber of Commerce, and was by that body referred to its legislative committee and Mr. Hand was added as a special member for the occasion. In the discussion in the chamber and also at the meeting of the legislative committee the policy of the Government acquiring privately owned lands, within the present boundaries, and also acquiring privately owned lands within the new or proposed boundaries of the forests were considered very objectionable because of the fact that every additional acre acquired by the Government ceases to be revenue producing, thus adding to the already overburden of the counties. Our chamber of commerce believes the principle on which the national forests were created to be right, in so far as conservation is concerned, and we have no objection to the Government acquiring privately owned lands, within or without the forests, provided legislation whereby the National Government would reimburse the counties along the lines suggested later in this letter, and which the bill prepared by you two years ago at the request of Mr. Hand would remedy, thus relieving the counties, and placing the burden where it belongs, even though we are not fully satisfied with the exchange provisions in the four bills introduced by you, for we view them as along similar lines as the old scrip and lieu land acts, and just as wide open to fraud.

A little over a year ago Mr. Paul G. Redington, district forester at San Francisco, sent out a circular letter to the various forest supervisors in his district, in which he quotes from a paper on the subject of exchange of lands within forests, which was read at Spokane by Mr. Huntington Taylor, general manager of the Edward Rutledge Timber Co., and which Mr. Redington advised "will form a basis to argue on should you (meaning his forest supervisors) have the opportunity to discuss the general subject with boards of supervisors and other public officials."

In the paper read by Mr. Taylor he says that "The question of the effect of land exchange on the tax receipts of the States and counties is important, but there seems to be small cause for public alarm." We certainly believe the effect on the counties to be "important," so much so that unless relief measures are forthcoming some, if not all, of the counties will be seriously injured in their sources of revenue from taxation. Mr. Taylor says that "In the timber regions the stumpage owner will have a keen interest in tax matters for a good many years to come, and there will be small likelihood of his supporting any measure which will mean an abrupt increase in his taxes," all of which means that they are on the job. The big timber interests are behind and backing the exchange bills, consequently they must be satisfied; so also is the district forester, Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior, but how about the counties, and what provision has been made for reimbursing them for this loss of revenue? Have the county boards of supervisors been consulted? Are they willing that the boundaries of the forests be enlarged by the taking in of vast areas of lands outside the present boundaries and from which they are now receiving tax revenue, said lands by your bills to become publicly owned, and therefore not subject to taxation? Are the taxpayers who maintain county government in counties a portion of which is in the Shasta, Plumas, El Dorado, and Tahoe Forests willing that cut-over lands now owned by private individuals be taken in exchange for standing timber, thus losing their percentage on stumpage sales? We do not think so and believe that they are entitled to consideration and to be heard in the matter.

On the subject of cut-over lands owned by private individuals within the forests Mr. Taylor mentions the possibility of the timber concerns allowing the taxes to become delinquent, and uses the following language: "Unquestionably, as time goes on and the accumulated burden of taxes becomes heavier the private owner will be forced to unload his cut-over lands." This, Mr. RAKER, is a serious problem, for should it happen the lands would become delinquent, be sold by the State for taxes, and would cease to be revenue producing or would fall into the hands of stock raisers and would lose much of their value as forest-producing lands. I am convinced that the Government should acquire the cut-over lands and allow them to reforest, but this should not be done at the expense of the counties in which the forests are located. The Federal Government should reimburse the counties, thus placing the burden where it belongs—that is, upon all of the people of the United States—and the counties should not be compelled to bear this burden for possibly 200 years, which time it would take for reforestation.

Quoting again from Mr. Taylor, "The national forests now turn over 35 per cent of their gross incomes to the counties in which they are situated. In some localities this already overbalances the tax returns which would have been secured if the lands had passed to private ownership, etc." If the statement of Mr. Taylor is true, then from the standpoint of the National Government, it is but another argument in favor of reimbursing the counties on a valuation basis, as it would be a gain for the Nation, and there is no question but that the counties would be better satisfied. I disagree with and doubt if there is a forest in the United States where the above is true, unless it be in one particular year, but surely it is not true covering a period of years. It is not so with any of the forests in California. Plumas County is, perhaps, receiving more revenue from stumpage sales than is any other county in this State. I have heard from most of the counties in all of the forests in this State and am informed that they are receiving very little returns from the sale of Government-owned timber. The greater part of the Eldorado National Forest is in Eldorado County, and is in part in Placer, Amador, Alpine, and a small part in Nevada. In the year 1915 the Federal Government paid into the treasury of Eldorado County, as returns from all sources, including timber sales, pasturage, etc., the sum of $1,271.34; in 1916, $1,947.44; in 1917, $466.22; in 1918, $1,823.88; in 1919, $2,485.80; and in 1920 the sum of $2,828.02, making a grand total for a period of six years, $11,782.80. The figures I quote are taken from the books of the treasurer of Eldorado County and his certificate accompanies this letter, and are not based on the mere say so of some person who is trying to create the impression that the counties are receiving substantial revenue from the forests. Trinity County alone has upward of 16,000,000 feet of Government-owned standing timber, and practically none of it is being sold, hence no revenue, and such is the case in the other counties parts of which are in forest reserves. The large timber concerns now operating are not buying timber from the Government on a stumpage basis, but are cutting over their own lands, thus decreasing their assessed valuation, and in this county they get a reduction in assessed valuation of $13 per acre on each acre cut over, so you see it means decreased valuation of privately owned lands within the forests, and increased valuation on lands outside the forest to produce revenue sufficient to maintain county government.

About two years ago you prepared a bill which if enacted into law would result in reimbursing the counties in which national forests are located. We respectfully and urgently request that you again take the matter up and press it in the present session of Congress, for we believe that the justice of such a bill should insure its passage.

A glance at the map of the United States showing the national forests thereon will convince you of the importance to the West of a relief measure such as we ask, and more particularly to California and to your district, with a series of national forests along almost the entire east side of the State and for many miles along the coast. The legislation we ask would provide for the National Government reimbursing the forest counties on a valuation basis of Government-owned lands, the valuation to be fixed as per privately owned lands within the same forest or upon a standing-timber basis, either of which we believe to be just and equitable ways to solve the problem.

We wish to make our position clear, and being more familiar with the El Dorado National Forest than with any of the other forests we will use it as an example. This forest contains 840,128 acres of land, 553,388 acres of which are Government-owned lands, and being in a national forest are not subject to entry or to taxation. There are 246,740 acres of land in this forest owned by private individuals, and the average assessed valuation of this privately owned land is about $12 per acre. As above stated, there are 553,388 acres owned by the Government, which said last number of acres of land at the average assessed valuation of $12 per acre as per privately owned lands within said forest is a loss to us in assessed valuation of $6,500,000, and will continue to be so long as the law remains as it is.

The fact that $6,500,000 is lost to Placer, El Dorado, Amador, Alpine, and a part of Nevada in assessed valuation means that at our present rate of taxation we are losing in taxes annually about $150,000. I am assuming that you who are familiar with the rapidity with which timberlands and grazing lands have been taken up in the past will realize that every acre of available land within all forests would long ago have been in private hands had not the reserves been created.

The Government-owned timber on this reserve has been cruised and estimated, and the figures disclose that there are 4,841,862,000 feet board measure. An estimate of $1.50 stumpage per thousand feet, which is a low estimate, indeed, would fix a valuation of more than $7,000,000 on the timber alone, and with the land values would make a total valuation of upward of $10,000,000.

We are firm believers in the conservation of our natural resources and consider ourselves as friends of the Forest Service, and are sure that the enactment of a law such as we ask will result in placing them on a more firm basis, but under the present law do not believe the burden properly distributed. Instead of the few people who reside in counties a part of which happens to be in a district forest being compelled to bear the burden, the 110,000,000 who reside in all of the United States should assume their just proportion, for surely they are as much interested in conservation as are the people who live in a county or combination of counties comprising a district forest. The man who contemplates building in New York, Washington, or San Francisco, on the farms of the Middle West, or in the Prairie States must have timber; his interests in that respect lie in our national forests, yet the community in which he lives is not restricted as are the counties in which the forests are, because of the fact that all of their lands are open to entry and to taxation. No part of Sacramento or any of the other valley or bay counties are in a forest reserve; the forest counties have been cut in two so far as taxation is concerned for the benefit of these counties and also for the benefit of all of the people of the United States.

The entire California delegation in Congress should be behind you in this matter, for they can not say that they are not interested in the welfare of their sister counties, for they are; our prosperity adds to their prosperity; we are decreasing in population, all of which hurts business in their counties, and such is the case in nearly all of the counties in which district forests lie. The outside counties must look to these forests for material for their factories and shops, and if they carry out their building program they must have timber, they must have box stuff for their orchards, and must look to these forests for electricity for lights and power, and for water for domestic and irrigation purposes. We perform all police powers, furnish the courts, finance the prosecutions of all persons committing crimes within the forest; we must construct roads, build bridges, and erect and maintain schools within the forests. Then why are we not entitled to be reimbursed?

We will be pleased to hear from you, and hope that you will take vigorous hold of this matter and push the same until final enactment into law. We respectfully ask that you defer action on the four exchange bills until such time as we have an opportunity to take the matter up with the other counties in the four districts, which we will proceed to do at once.

Wishing you the compliments of the season, we remain,

Very truly, yours,

My reply to the Placerville Chamber of Commerce is of date January 20, 1922, and is as follows:

JANUARY 20, 1922.

Mr. JOSEPH SCHERRER,
Chairman Eldorado County Chamber of Commerce,
Placerville, Calif.

In re: Exchange bills.

MY DEAR MR. SCHERRER: Yours of December 30, 1921, reached Washington in my absence and receipt thereof was acknowledged on January 5.

I have now fully and carefully gone over the presentation of this matter in your letter of above-named date. Such presentation is very clear and distinct, couched in language that one can not fail to understand. Statement by Hon. Don H. Goodrich, treasurer, of date December 30, 1921, showing receipts by the treasurer of Eldorado County from Eldorado National Forest, received.

The subject involved in these bills was discussed before the Committee on Public Lands of the House during the Sixty-sixth Congress. You will find my position therein expressed as to a general exchange bill, thinking local bills covering separate forests would be better, so that in each instance the county in which the national forest was situated might first be heard, since which time I have tried to follow that procedure. I am sending you a copy of such hearing, also copy of the four bills referred to in your letter, together with the reports thereon.

Before I asked for a hearing on these bills by the Public Lands Committee I had sent out quite extensively copies of the bills to public officials and to practically all the newspapers in the district, hoping thereby to obtain the sentiment of the localities and counties specifically affected. The only responses I obtained were favorable. I also on numerous occasions, while through California a year ago last summer, discussed this subject off and on with many parties and my understanding from such interviews was that such proposed legislation would be satisfactory, and, in the long run, beneficial. I during all the time had in mind and realized the taxation question so clearly presented in the letter of your Chamber of Commerce. The matter standing thus, I proceeded with the proposed legislation.

The Hand proposition is right, and, to my mind, unanswerable; but while I have been working on it in the House certain Senators have been working on it on a little different line in the Senate. We have not proceeded very far because of the general opposition in the East to provide for taxation for western counties in which forest reserves are situated, and then the contention that we are receiving now as much, if not more, than we could by direct taxation, from the revenue and receipts from permits, timber, etc., from the national forests. However, notwithstanding this contention and opposition, the Hand proposal will continue to have my favorable and earnest consideration and attention.

I note the last paragraph of this letter, which reads as follows:

"We respectfully ask that you defer action on the four exchange bills until such time as we have an opportunity to take the matter up with the other counties in the four districts, which we will proceed to do at once."

This request is but fair and will be complied with, notwithstanding the present status of such bills, or either of them, now on the calendar of the House.

Since receiving your letter I received a telegram yesterday from the Amador Chamber of Commerce, by W. D. Tam, president, and the Amador County Board of Supervisors, by D. V. Ramazzotti, chairman, indorsing the position of Eldorado County, its grand jury, and chamber of commerce in regard to the forest exchange bills, and they unite with you in asking that, before passage, compensation to the counties be made a part of the measure.

The matters will be held in abeyance, therefore, until all parties are given opportunity for hearing and every effort be made to secure an enactment of the Hand proposition.

Kindly advise your associates accordingly. I am acknowledging their joint letter, advising each one that I have written to you fully on the subject.

With personal regards, I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER, M. C.,

Mr. Scherrer, under date of January 31, 1922, wrote on this subject as follows:

SHERIFF ELDORADO COUNTY,
Placerville, Calif., January 31, 1922.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: Replying to your letter relative to forest matters, will say that we are pleased to note that you consider our position right and just, and that you propose using your efforts in an endeavor to have enacted into law a measure which will reimburse the counties for loss of revenue caused by the creation of forest reserves.

We have examined the exchange bill relative to the Eldorado Forest and find that in addition to the 840,128 acres already within the old forest boundaries this bill, if enacted into law, would take in 133,000 additional acres, 125,551 of which additional acres are in Eldorado County.

A careful study and examination has been made and we find that a large portion of the 125,551 acres aforesaid is privately owned and on which taxes are now being paid to the county, and that the present assessed valuation of what is in private hands is $905,924; this valuation, computed at our average tax rate of $2.28 on the $100 valuation, means that we will lose in taxes upward of $20,000 per year, in addition to what we are already losing in the original forest, should the boundaries proposed in the exchange bills relative to this forest, and the spirit of the bill and declared policy of the Government that "of acquiring all privately owned lands" be carried out, and if it is not carried out, then what is the purpose of the bills?

In the matter of the exchange of lands on the checkerboard plan, of which so much has been said, we submit that this will not decrease the number of acres of privately owned lands. If you exchange 40 acres here for 40 acres elsewhere, how will that decrease the privately owned acreage? Nor will the exchange of lands in one forest for lands in another forest decrease the privately owned lands: It will result in a change of holdings, and nothing more. We admit that the exchange of virgin timber for cut-over lands will decrease the privately owned acreage, but none of the above plans will result in a lessening of the fire hazard, unless campers and hunters are to be kept outside the forests, for experience has taught that most of the fires come from this source.

In the matter of the Tahoe Forest, will say that we have computed the acreage that bill will add to the present forest, and we find 452,480 acres will be annexed to the already large acreage of the old forest should that bill become the law.

The matter of the loss of an assessed valuation to Eldorado County of $905,924 and an annual loss of upwards of $20,000 in taxes may not be considered much to some of the large counties in the United States, but to us, with a total assessed valuation of about $10,000,000 and a population of about 7,000, seems to us to be quite a considerable sum and prompts us to again ask that before the exchange bills pass provision be made to reimburse the counties. The Department of Agriculture should see these things and the justice of what we ask should appeal to its officials, as well as to the Congressman and Senator from east or west, north or south.

You will hear from this committee again and also from other counties soon. Wishing you success and hoping that you have been successful in lining up the California Representatives and others, we remain,

Very truly, yours,

JOS. SCHERRER,
T. G. PATTON,
TED C. ATWOOD,
W. E. DILLINGER,

My reply to Mr. Scherrer's letter of January 31, 1922, is as follows:

FEBRUARY 18, 1922.

Mr. JOSEPH SCHERRER,
Placerville, Calif.

MY DEAR MR. SCHERRER: The letter from yourself, T. G. Patton, Ted C. Atwood, and W. E. Dillinger, as committee, and Chas. E. Hand, as secretary, of date January 31, 1922, at hand.

I note that you received the exchange bills. I have read very carefully your presentation of the matter after your study and examination, as it relates to the Eldorado Forest. While I have had Mr. Hand's proposition before me for some time, namely, a law which will reimburse the counties for loss of revenue caused by the creation of forest reserves, I find I have a difficult task on hand in properly framing such legislation.

I have written to Mr. Hand to give me his best suggestion and judgment on the matter so that I might be able to consummate the drawing of this legislation at the earliest time possible.

I note your statement in your letter of above date "that before the exchange bills pass, provision be made to reimburse the counties." I find that I have a task on hand that is not easy to prepare in the first instance, and then a Herculean task to have it effected. However, I shall continue to give it my every attention as suggested by your committee. Therefore, lend me such assistance as you can, and your committee and Mr. Hand consider yourselves free to make such suggestions as will assist in bringing about the proper inauguration of the policy suggested.

Kindly remember me to your associates, as this letter is for all of you. With kindest personal regards, believe me, I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER,
Member of Congress.

Sheriff C. E. Hand, of Placerville, Calif., under date of February 18, 1922, writes as follows:

SHERIFF OF ELDORADO COUNTY,
Placerville, Calif., February 18, 1922.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: I am mailing you under separate cover some copies of a booklet on the exchange bills and county reimbursement plan, and I would be pleased to have you see that each of the California Representatives and Senators receives a copy.

The booklet contains about all of the data I have collected, or at least all that I have had the time to prepare or tabulate up to the present time. I find it to be a big job.

I am told that one of the exchanges contemplated is that of the Central Pacific Railroad holdings in the forests of California for lands in Nevada; and here is where the checkerboard, so called, comes into operation, as the holdings of that company are the odd-numbered sections. Should this exchange be brought about, it will mean that Eldorado County would lose 65,000 acres of lands from which we are now receiving revenue from taxation, and Placer, Nevada, and Sierra, and some of the other counties will lose even more.

I realize that this exchange can not be made under the provisions of the bills introduced by you, as it is interstate, but it can be done under the Snell, or general, bill, which makes no provision for State lines. This exchange should not be allowed unless the interests of the counties are taken care of.

The Forest Service is citing the fact that the Government has millions of dollars invested in custom houses, ports, post offices, etc., in various cities throughout the country which are not subject to taxation, and are claiming they are parallel cases with the national forests.

I submit they are not parallel cases and are not so considered by the legislative branch of the Government or by the heads of the various departments of Government. If so, the cities would be receiving 25 per cent of the revenue from the customhouses, internal revenue, and post offices. There is a vast difference; one is for revenue and profit and the other is conservation, the conserving of resources created by nature, and narrow, indeed, is the vision of the person who claims to be a friend of conservation and can not see this.

The Government purchased the sites in cities from individuals and expended large sums of money for the erection of buildings; in other words, the Government created something. On the other hand, the Government did not even create one of the flakes of snow that falls direct into the forest lake and commingles with the waters thereof or that spreads its white mantle over the forest. Nature did that.

The Government did not create one particle of the soil that furnishes the nourishment for plant life, nor create even one of the needles on the stately pine. If conservation of our natural resources is to be measured in dollars and cents, then it is a failure, for it costs about $40,000 per year to administer the Eldorado National Forest and the revenue is but about $8,000 per year; it is not based on dollars and cents; its plan is broader.

When our State was formed boundaries were established between the various counties; the resources within the counties were a part of county assets. All of the lands were open to entry and to taxation. Later the National Government wisely took from us many of the resources we enjoyed in the beginning and set them aside for the benefit of all of the people, and no provision was made to reimburse us except the 25 per cent, which is inadequate. All of the revenue derived from the forests should be retained by the Government and the counties reimbursed on a valuation basis.

I will be pleased to hear from you, letting me know how you are progressing. With kindest regards, and assuring you of my support and best wishes, I remain,

As ever,

C. E. HAND.

My reply to Mr. Hand's letter, of date February 18, is as follows:

In re: Forest exchange bills.

DEAR MR. HAND: Yours of February 18, regarding the forest exchange bills and county reimbursement plan, at hand. The booklets on this subject were received, and, as you requested, I have presented a copy to the Senators and each of the California Representatives.

I am giving the data furnished in the booklet my best consideration. As I wrote Mr. Scherrer, this is not an easy task to accomplish, but it will be given my best personal consideration and attention, with a view to favorable results, difficult though they may be.

The general exchange bill passed the Senate and was reported out favorably by the House Committee on the Public Lands, and beyond doubt within the next couple of weeks it will pass the House and go to the President for his approval. The reimbursement plan legislation can go on, notwithstanding this enactment of the general exchange legislation. We are going to get but little encouragement from the Eastern and Middle Western States on any allowance for reimbursement, for they feel now that we are getting more than we are entitled to by virtue of the 35 per cent and then the amount allowed for road construction. Taking it all in all, we will have no easy sledding, but when a thing is worth while it is wholly immaterial the time and labor it takes to obtain it.

With personal regards, I am,

Yours, most truly,

JOHN E. RAKER,
Member of Congress.

On this same subject and directly bearing on the importance of it, I am inserting a letter written to Mr. Hand by Hon. Paul G. Redington, of San Francisco, of date February 21, 1922, which was sent to me by Mr. Hand, the letter reading as follows:

FEBRUARY 21, 1922.

ELDORADO COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Placerville, Calif.

GENTLEMEN: I have been greatly interested in the discussion that has been going on in Eldorado County regarding the effect of a proposed land exchange bill in Congress on the county revenue. Some of the articles published in the Placerville Republican contain figures which do not at all accord with those shown in our official records. Nor does the real working of a land-exchange transaction seem to be locally fully understood by those arguing for relief from threatened loss of revenue. Conceiving that there will be no objection to my entrance into the discussion as the local representative of one of the main parties at interest, viz., Uncle Sam, I offer in the following a statement of the national forestry situation, the place of the exchange method of acquisition of lands in the forestry program, the operation of land-exchange legislation, and its immediate bearing on the finances of El Dorado County. I offer this with the hope that it may clear up some existing uncertainties and bring out points not heretofore considered in any of the discussions I have seen in the newspapers.

There has been a nation-wide discussion of the forestry question in the last three years, based on accepted premises, as follows:

1. Timber is a renewable resource if given adequate protection.

2. All lands chiefly valuable for production of timber should be kept in productive shape to avoid huge economic loss.

3. Our timber supplies are being cut much faster than they can be replaced by growth of young timber. Virgin supplies of timber have been depleted to an alarming extent in all forest regions of the United States except in the West, where cutting is being carried on at a rapid pace. There exists no doubt as to coming stringency of forest products.

4. To ameliorate the situation described under 3 above there is needed (a) a larger area of forest land in public ownership, (b) Federal or State legislation, or both, to insure the application of fire protection and reasonable forest practice to privately owned lands.

Two forestry bills have already been given much consideration in committees of the National Congress, namely, the Snell and Capper bills. They differ in the matter of the agency which shall regulate, but both include a provision for acquisition of forest lands by the Federal Government through exchange with private owners.

Many exchange bills have already passed Congress and are in operation. Many others are now pending, including the one which is applicable to the Eldorado Forest and against which Eldorado County has protested. The class of land which the Federal Government prefers to acquire under exchange is cut-over land. Please note this, as it has a direct bearing on the published statements of individuals of Eldorado County and on the figures given by them in support of their protest. Privately owned cut-over lands are not now being adequately protected by the majority of owners, although there is a growing appreciation on the part of many of them that they have a public responsibility in this regard. The Government and State are at present the only agencies who can give reasonably adequate protection to such lands, and the State is not yet largely in this business.

Under the exchange bills the Government may trade (1) land and timber for equal values of land and timber, or it may acquire (2) privately owned cut-over land in return for Government stumpage. The first method is to be used to consolidate scattered holdings for more facile administration. Under such kind of exchange, the values being equal, the county taxes would not be involved.

The second method is the one in which the Government is most greatly interested, because of the very great need of keeping up the production of timber on cut-over lands. It is the sole method with which the counties are concerned with respect to their tax returns.

It operates in this way: Cut-over land has a value of $2.50 per acre (assumed). Stumpage per thousand feet board measure has the same value (assumed). Therefore if the Government saw that it was to its advantage to acquire 10,000 acres of cut-over land worth to the owner $25,000, it would negotiate to give the owner $25,000 worth of merchantable timber. If the deal was consumed the title of the 10,000 acres of cut-over land would pass to the Government. The title of 10,000,000 feet of timber worth $25,000 would pass to the private owner. This timber is taxable by the county as long as it remains in private ownership. The title to the land on which the merchantable timber is located remains with the Government, and the timber when cut by the private owner must be cut under Government supervision.

Keeping in mind that the Government is interested in the acquisition of cut-over land primarily, the figures which follow will be of interest to your taxpayers. I think also they may be of value as showing that the statements and figures published by those in Eldorado County, who are arguing for relief from the Government, are based on misapprehension as to the operation of the exchange and its effect on county revenue.

Area of privately owned timberland in Eldorado County within Eldorado Forest, 188,700 acres.

Of this area there are 152,500 acres of land having a stand of merchantable timber and 36,200 acres of cut-over land.

The 36,200 acres of cut-over land have an assessed valuation of $2.50 per acre, a tax of $2 per hundred. Present county revenue from this class of land is $1,810.

Annually through operation of logging companies there is added 1,600 acres to the area of cut-over land. At the same valuation and rate this land would bring an annual return in taxes to the county of $80.

If, then, the Government acquired at once the 36,200 acres of cut-over land, the county would lose an annual revenue of $1,810. If the Government thereafter acquired annually the 1,600 acres of current cut-over land, the county revenues would suffer an annual loss of $80. The Chief Forester, appreciating the possible loss of revenue to the counties through land-exchange operations on any large scale, has plainly stated his policy that in no event should exchanges be made so as to cause more than 25 per cent reduction yearly in the annual revenue which counties receive (through the State) from the Federal Government as their share of the receipts from sales of forest resources. The amount of this fund received during the fiscal year 1920 by Eldorado County was $2,828. (The 1921 return figures are not available, but should be greater than 1920.) If an exchange was started with a private timberland owner immediately, we could not, under the forester's policy, negotiate a trade which would operate to annually decrease the forest return to the county more than $707. One of your citizens is stated, in an article published in the January 31 issue of the Placerville Republican, to have found that the exchange bill for the Eldorado Forest would take over 138,000 acres from the county and would bring an annual loss of $20,000 in revenue to Eldorado County. This gentleman has apparently concluded that the exchange bill would operate immediately on passage to transfer all the privately owned merchantable timberland into Government ownership. I trust that I have shown this as not within the realm of possibility.

As an offset to the slight reduction in Eldorado County's revenue which would result in a land-exchange transaction, there is to be considered the increasing value of the young timber on the transferred cut-over land. There is to be considered the increasing 25 per cent road and school and 10 per cent road funds with increase of Government-owned acreage within the county. There is to be considered the fact that the very existence of this valuable public property within the borders of the county has been responsible for direct congressional appropriations for road and trail projects, this appropriation amounting to thousands of dollars. As the Government acreage slowly increases, there should surely be no diminution of Federal aid in this respect.

There are other offsets which might be mentioned, but space does not permit.

I want to make clear to the counties that we have absolutely no quarrel with them in their desire to fully protect their county revenues. I think, however, you will agree with me that upon the receipt of such an appeal as you have made to your Representatives in Congress they will naturally desire to be in possession of all facts bearing on this problem. I have therefore endeavored in this letter to put up to you certain pertinent phases of this land-exchange plan which Congress would most certainly desire to consider before acting on your request.

If I can give you further information by letter or through personal conference, please do not hesitate to call upon me. Supervisor Smith, at Placerville, can also give you considerable data on this question and will be glad to do so.

Copies of this letter are being sent to the county boards of supervisors, chamber of commerce, and others who I have learned are interested in El Dorado County's appeal for relief.

Assuring you of the earnest desire of this organization to work closely in harmony with you at all times, I am,

Very truly, yours,

PAUL G. REDINGTON,
District Forester.

Mr. Hand replied to Mr. Redington's letter, which letter is as follows:

PLACERVILLE, CALIF., February 23, 1922.

Mr. PAUL G. REDINGTON,
United States District Forester, San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In your letter of February 21, 1922, relative to exchange bills now pending in Congress we note the following: "Some of the articles published in the Placerville Republican contain figures which do not at all accord with those shown in our official records." We are not surprised at this, for at no time have you taken the counties' taxable interests into consideration, you figure along different lines.

We are surprised, however, at the arbitrary manner in which you fixed the new boundaries of the forest and the way in which you attempted to have this legislation passed, and your ignoring of boards of supervisors and other civic bodies in the counties concerned, and we shall make a strong endeavor to have the exchange bills now pending so amended that notice of proposed exchange be published locally and furnished the boards of supervisors in interested counties.

Again, you say, "Nor does the real working of a land-exchange transaction seem to be locally understood by those arguing for relief from threatened loss of revenue." We have the Shasta, Plumas, Tahoe, and Eldorado Forest exchange bills, also the reports thereon. We have the Snell and Capper bills, and all committee reports, views of the Secretaries of Agriculture and Interior, the testimony of Mr. Sherman, and all of the witnesses who testified before the Sinnott committee of the House, and if there is more information to be had we should be glad to receive it.

We understand, however, some of the provisions of the bills the same as you have explained them, but you are not frank in the matter; you are attempting to have the public believe that exchange can only be made in the same forest, while, as a matter of fact, they are interforest, intercounty, and interstate exchangeable. Why do you not tell the public that the real checkerboard proposition, so called, applies principally to the railroad holding every odd-numbered section and that you are contemplating acquiring these holdings in exchange for lands in Nevada? We know this exchange can not be made under either the Shasta, Plumas, Tahoe, or Eldorado exchange bills, but it can be done under the general bill, which makes no distinction as to State lines.

Why do you not tell the people that this single exchange of railroad holdings within national forests in this State would result in a loss of revenue on hundreds of thousands of acres to the counties? Eldorado County alone would lose in values on approximately 60,000 acres and several thousand dollars annually in taxes. By this exchange, based on past payments, we would lose more in one year in taxes than the National Government pays to this county as returns from stumpage and grazing on the entire forest area within the county in several years.

Quoting again from your letter, "Conceiving that there will be no objection to my entrance into the discussion as the local representative of one of the main parties at interest, viz, Uncle Sam," we accord to you as a citizen of the United States the right to enter into any discussion you may see fit, provided the same is of a lawful nature, but we question your wisdom as an administrative officer in attempting to dictate what legislation should be passed, particularly when you fail to take into consideration the best interests of the counties in which district forests lie.

Why should you oppose adequate reimbursement of counties and be so active in having passed legislation we deem not to our best interests, particularly when that legislation is so eagerly sought by the timber interests? All we are asking is that we be reimbursed and that the exchange bills be held until provision is made to reimburse us. What objection can you or the Forest Service have to this just demand? We wish to know, so that we may tell it to our people.

Nowhere in your letter have you touched on the point at issue, and what we maintain to be right—that is, that the forest counties are entitled to adequate reimbursement, and that the burden of forests be placed where it belong—that is, on the 110,000,000 people who reside in all of the United States. Please let us know on what grounds you oppose this demand.

We can not conceive that you will argue in the face of the fact that for the year 1921 Eldorado County received as compensation from forest-timber sales, pasturage, etc., the sum of $1,984, and the 39 forest counties of the entire State the sum of $132,406. Will you maintain that this is adequate reimbursement, or that what you have been claiming in the past "that the counties are receiving as much from the national forests as if the property had passed to private ownership and being taxed"?

Quoting from your letter, "cut-over land has a value of $2.50 per acre ($3 in this county), stumpage per board measure has the same value. Therefore if the Government saw that it was to its advantage to acquire 10,000 acres of cut-over land worth to the owner $25,000, it would negotiate to give to the owner $25,000 worth of merchantable timber. If the deal was consummated, the title to the 10,000 acres of cut-over land would pass to the Government. The title to the 10,000,000 feet of timber worth $25,000 would pass to the private owner. This timber is taxable by the county as long as it remains in private ownership, title to the land remaining in the Government." We will say that you make such an exchange with either the California Door Co. or the Michigan-California Lumber Co.; both of said companies have been approached on the subject of exchange of lands by your department.

The first-named company cuts some 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 feet per year, and the latter much more; so you see your timber may be cut and sold before the county has an opportunity to tax it, or it may stand for one or two years. Then what? As you say, "The figures will be of interest to your taxpayers." They are of interest and we are endeavoring to look out for our interests; that is why we are asking that we be reimbursed for this loss.

On the subject of cut-over lands, the Chamber of Commerce of Placer, Amador, and Eldorado Counties, and also the boards of supervisors of the three counties are squarely on record as follows:

"We are convinced that the Government should acquire the cut-over lands and allow them to reforest, but this should not be done at the expense of the counties in which forests are located, the counties should not be compelled to bear this burden for possibly 200 years, which time it would take for reforestation."

We aim to be just and right, and if there is injustice in this demand, please point it out, as we are seeking information and desire to accomplish nothing but what is right. If, on the other hand, you find honesty and justice of purpose on our part, then tell us just why you are so actively opposed to justice and right.

Quoting again from your letter, "One of your citizens is stated in an article published in the Placerville Republican to have found that the exchange bill for the Eldorado Forest would take over 133,000 acres from the county and would bring an annual loss of $20,000 in revenue from Eldorado County. This gentleman has apparently concluded that the exchange bill would operate immediately on passage." The gentleman is assuming nothing of the kind; he is simply taking you at your word when you say, "It is extremely desirable to acquire them and re-form our boundaries along permanent physical lines, * * * and it is hoped that through land-exchange legislation they may be gradually acquired." If you do not intend to acquire the lands, then why are you extending the boundaries?

The article above referred to gave the name of the person responsible for it and the subject was discussed by that person with Forest Supervisor Smith. Why do you not name him?

The computation was made from the description in the Eldorado Forest exchange bill itself, then checked with the 1921 tax rolls to ascertain loss of revenue. What was said on the subject follows:

"We have examined the exchange bill relative to the Eldorado Forest and find that in addition to the 840,128 acres already within the old forest boundaries this bill, if enacted into law, would take in 133,000 additional acres, 125,551 of which additional acres are in Eldorado County.

A careful study and examination has been made and we find that a large portion of the 125,551 acres aforesaid is privately owned and on which taxes are now being paid to the county and that the present assessed valuation of what is in private hands is $905,924. This valuation, computed at our average tax rate of $2.28 on the $100 valuation, means that we will lose in taxes upward of $20,000 per year, in addition to what we are already losing in the original forest, should the boundaries proposed in the exchange bills relative to this forest, and the spirit of the bill and declared policy of the Government that "of acquiring all privately owned lands" be carried out, and if it is not carried out what then is the purpose of the bills?

You state that "copies of your letter are being circulated to boards of supervisors, chambers of commerce, and others who, I have learned, are interested in Eldorado County's appeal for relief." Eldorado County is not appealing for relief, we are demanding justice; and you know that this movement is not confined to this county or even this State, but is a live issue in several of the States.

Inasmuch as you have circulated your letter, it is up to us to circulate this, our reply.

JOSEPH SCHERRER,
TED. C. ATWOOD,
H. E. DILLINGER,
Legislative Committee.
CHARLES SCHRODER,
Board of Supervisors.
CHAS. E. HAND,
Secretary Committee.

The importance of this matter is such that I feel it my duty to present it here and now. The question will have to be met and settled and settled right at that.

The counties in which national forests are located are deeply and vitally concerned.

Some method to compensate them must be devised and that at an early date.

The above will call it to the attention of the House, with the hopes of favorable action. Relief is what these counties ask. Let all of the people share in the burden of maintaining the Government's future timber supply.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the first committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "published," insert the words "without expense to the United States."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I somewhat doubt the practicability of inserting that language in the law. As I understand as a rule the department requires people with whom it makes transfer to pay such expenses if there be such expenses. I do not think we want to require them to make publication by advertisement frequently; I should think generally it is the department that wants to make the exchange, not the private individual, and it is the Forest Service that really puts through the bill, and they want to get the land which is in private ownership in the forest. Now they will be required to publish an advertisement, inserted by the Government agent, Government official, and I suppose in a way the Government becomes responsible to the payment to the newspapers, although they may require the private individual to put up the money for it. I think it would complicate matters to put in a provision requiring the publication by the National Government of an advertisement without expense to the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. Where a private person is compelled to pay he puts up in advance in the Land Office and we were informed this was their practice. We thought there was enough mutuality between the private owners and the Government that the Government might cause the private owner to advance the money for the exchanges.

Mr. MANN. Very likely they would usually do that, in which case this is necessary, although the bill for the advertisement has to be rendered to the Government officials and is an obligation of the United States.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am not a stickler for that. I think we would be willing to acquiesce in the gentleman's premises.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to do it, as a practical matter.

Mr. SINNOTT. Possibly it is wise to do so, and I trust the House will disagree to that second committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "forest," strike out the words "in which" and insert "within whose exterior boundaries."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF DISBURSING OFFICERS, WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10429) authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to allow credits to and relieve certain disbursing officers of the War and Navy Departments in the settlement of certain accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get some information from the gentleman who reported this bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], from the Committee on the Judiciary. I will say that the report bears the earmarks of the bill having been well considered in the committee, in that it cites precedents for the passage of the bill beginning on March 3, 1849, and coming down to date. But the bill has this sweeping language in it:

To relieve disbursing officers or special disbursing agents of the War and Navy Departments from accountability or responsibility for losses occurring between April 6, 1917, and November 18, 1921, of funds or accounts, papers, records, vouchers, or data pertaining to said funds, for which said officers or agents were accountable or responsible.

In the report of the gentleman he says:

These suspended accounts in the two departments are more than 7,000 in number.

But there is no mention whatever made of the amount of money involved. Then at the conclusion of his report I find these remarkable statements that I do not understand, and that is what I want to invite the gentleman's attention to:

The subject matter dealt with by this bill is purely one of accounting, the money involved in every instance having been disbursed.

Now comes this proposition. First—

The money involved in every instance having been disbursed.

And—

The enactment of the bill can give rise to no claims whatever against the Government. Further, the legislation in no way abrogates any of the rights of the Government to proceed against its agents where it has cause to do so.

I am wondering just what the bill would do. What effect would this bill have on these lost accounts, with nobody responsible, and everybody relieved, and the Government in no way estopped? What good would it do to pass the bill?

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman desires information, I will state that with the many hundreds of thousands of transactions involving expenditures of Government money for war purposes, the accounting office finds when the accounts finally come to them the vouchers are missing; that bids and proposals do not accompany the accounts; that in many instances overpayments have been made of small amounts; and that in all these cases money has been paid and disbursed by the officers of the War and Navy Departments; that in some instances ships were torpedoed or sunk on the way back to the United States, having aboard large quantities of vouchers and supporting data. It is obviously impossible, of course, to have those produced in order to be filed in the accounting office. In other instances, small sums of money varying in amounts were given to Army officers when they were going out with small detachments of troops in order to have them buy coffee and rations—what is called "liquid coffee" money, in order to procure refreshments while they were out upon an expedition—and the officers in charge of the troops failed to get signed vouchers showing how the money was expended. His report shows he did expend a certain amount of money, but it is not separated by the vouchers from other data. Then, there are various other transactions in which the regulations and the law existing at the time were not complied with. But the expenditures of the money have been made. Now, the general accounting office states in the hearings before the Judiciary Committee that these accounts are known as "suspended accounts." They have all been filed with the comptroller, but he is not able to say upon the books of the Government what this money has been expended for. He shows the money was placed to the credit of the War and Navy Departments, but it has not been expended because of losses or irregularities.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Is there anything before the committee to indicate the amount?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. The amount runs up into several hundreds of millions of dollars in toto—I am not sure, but nearly $2,000,000,000—of all classes of expenditures that were made during the war.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In view of the language used in the report, what would be the status of these claims if this legislation was never enacted?

Mr. WALSH. The Government would never be able to close its books. They would have these charges against the War Department and Navy Department, and the general accounting office would have 7,000 suspended accounts which are now disallowed because not in compliance with law or regulation, and they would go right along from year to year, or it would show from year to year that this tremendous sum and this vast number of accounts had never been closed.

I will say to the gentleman that the accounting officers will not construe this liberally. The assistant comptroller has stated that in every instance where it is possible to secure secondary evidence, if primary evidence is missing, the officers will be called upon to produce it, and that they will make a very earnest effort to do so because, of course, it is to the interest of the comptroller and of the accounting office to have these accounts in such a shape as to satisfy either a committee of Congress or the General Comptroller that everything pertaining to a transaction is proper and that there is no fraud or collusion apparent. So we inserted in the bill a provision that where it involves transactions of over $1,000 it can only be done on the recommendation of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy; that he must have in support of his action the recommendation of the head of the department in which the expenditure or transaction occurs.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that even after the passage of this act the department will construe it strictly and demand evidence?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. The Assistant Comptroller General stated that after this act is passed he would require the best evidence obtainable relating to each transaction. In many instances the evidence is already on file in the accounting office.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I submit to the gentleman as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary that under this act, as reported and if passed in this condition, if they could not settle all these accounts simply as a matter of bookkeeping under this act, and that no secondary evidence or any other kind of evidence need be required?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the gentleman will understand that the comptroller's office is the one bulwark, so to speak, that is standing out against all Government departments where an expenditure of money is made, and in these cases they will at least have to be satisfied of the absence of fraud and collusion, and also have to be satisfied that there is a loss or some irregularity that can not be explained or supplied by other data.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I wish to ask one further question, and I see other gentlemen have questions in mind to submit. After this act is passed suppose the Government has a charge against an officer of the Government for so many dollars where the vouchers have not been found, and he says that he did pay the amount of money that he says he paid, and the voucher was lost on a ship, or was lost in some way on a train from Philadelphia to Washington, or lost in any other way, but in the absence of all of that he pleads this statute, that Congress has relieved him of that matter, and you have no further evidence of it?

Mr. WALSH. Congress has not relieved him. It confers authority simply on the Comptroller General and leaves discretion with him as to when the relief will be granted. As I recall the hearings, the assistant comptroller said that it was very possible that there are cases pending of suspended accounts where, if the evidence is not forthcoming, the allowance or credits will not be granted.

I will say, if the gentleman will permit me further, that this is along the line of what Congress has found to be absolutely necessary to do after each war in which the Government has participated. It has found that bringing into the service a great number of men unfamiliar with Government accounting, and with great haste in the expenditure of money and great pressure connected with various transactions, a great many failures to comply with the law and regulations result.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I agree with the gentleman as to that, but in view of the fact that $2,000,000,000 is involved in this in a sweeping act to be passed like this on unanimous-consent day it might be well to have it explained.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad the gentleman asked the questions, and I am very glad to give him information.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman as to the reason for extending the date down to as late a day as November 18, 1921?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman that the request was to make the period range from April 6, 1917, to March 4, 1921, but when an examination was made of some prior acts it was found that the date was either extended to the termination of the war or the mustering of troops out of the service. I will say to the gentleman that it is better, inasmuch as it is to cover war expenditures, to include the duration of the war. The latter date is the day after the President's proclamation declaring that the treaties had been ratified and exchanged.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in some prior relief acts following other wars that the amount that could be checked off in this way is limited to $5,000, for example. Here you place no limit at all and allow the accounting officers to wipe out the entire amount. Can the gentleman tell us what is the largest amount in any case?

Mr. WALSH. The largest individual voucher, as I recall, was one for $97,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. How much will be the total charge on the Treasury by virtue of the passage of this act?

Mr. WALSH. There will be no charge on the Treasury at all. This money has already been paid.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman mean to say that by virtue of the passage of this law no money will go out of the Treasury?

Mr. WALSH. None. The money has already gone out of the Treasury, and in a number of instances overpayments have been made, and if this law is not enacted, of course, the Government would have a claim against the officer. There are several thousand of them. The overpayments run, I think, from a dollar up to $60 or $70.

Mr. GARNER. What would be the total amount of claims affected by this bill?

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman that there are 7,000 suspended accounts. Many of the accounts have thousands of separate items in them, and we were told that as to these disallowance sheets, in order for the Comptroller General to make a complete schedule for each account and present it to the committee, it will take from 5 to 10 clerks from two to three weeks to go over all these papers and classify them.

Mr. GARNER. But he could not give an estimate of the total amount of claims that would be settled under this bill?

Mr. WALSH. These are not claims, I will say to the gentleman from Texas. These are accounts. These are accounts that are suspended. It is shown in one case, which, I think, happened down in South Carolina or Georgia, that they purchased a large number of turkeys for the soldiers' Christmas or Thanksgiving dinner. They received the bill for the turkeys, showing that so many pounds of turkeys were supplied at so much per pound, and that so-and-so received so much money for them, but it was not accompanied by the bid and proposal to furnish those turkeys. Consequently that account was disallowed.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman made the statement a moment ago that there were claims against certain officers of the Government, and that this would seek to relieve the officers from the claims. What is the total amount of claims pending against various officers of the Government?

Mr. WALSH. We were unable to get the total, but the claims in many instances are so small that it would cost a great deal more to institute proceedings to collect them than they are worth. They run in individual instances from $1 up to $60 or $70, which, if I remember correctly, is the maximum of any of these various claims resulting from overpayments or the expenditure of money irrespective of regulations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the testimony before the committee disclose how much is involved in suits that are now pending or that have been brought to recover excess payments where error or fraud is involved?

Mr. WALSH. There are no suits pending that have been brought to the attention of the committee, and if the Comptroller General finds any of these accounts to be tainted with fraud or collusion he is not authorized to apply this remedy.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have in mind the case of an officer who in the handling of supplies was billed with them and there was an error made in the extension. In settling the account that error was not discovered. He sold for cash and is only accountable for the cash which he disbursed. Three years after he left the Army the Government, noticing the error in the extension, charged him with the $100 which had been erroneously extended, and apparently they can not do anything except charge him with it, although they admit that there was an error in the extension and that he is not short in his cash account. I understand there are a large number of claims of that character.

Mr. WALSH. Errors in computation.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And the only way they can be settled is by legislative enactment.

Mr. WALSH. In a great many cases they are the result of errors in extension, in the carrying out of totals.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But so far as the Government is concerned, and so far as involving any substantial claim against the officer, there is nothing at all to it.

Mr. WALSH. No. We are advised that if there exist any instances where overpayment should be recovered, those claims when they are analyzed will be referred to the solicitor or the proper legal officer to institute proceedings.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Some of the hardships in these cases have arisen, and, as I have personal knowledge, where paymasters in the Navy are involved.

Mr. WALSH. This includes the Navy Department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And the department has threatened to bring suit not only against the paymasters but against the sureties on their bonds, and these matters have been held in abeyance only upon the request of Members of Congress and others who have interceded. I consider this very important and desirable legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, through such officer as he may designate, and within two years from the passage of this act, (a) to relieve disbursing officers or special disbursing agents of the War and Navy Departments from accountability or responsibility for losses occurring between April 6, 1917, and November 18, 1921, of funds, or of accounts, papers, records, vouchers, or data pertaining to said funds, for which said officers or agents were accountable or responsible; and (b) to allow credits, in the settlement of accounts of said officers or agents, for payments made in good faith on public account during said period, notwithstanding failure to comply with requirements of existing law or regulations pursuant thereto: Provided, That in cases of losses or payments involving more than $1,000 the Comptroller General shall exercise the authority herein only upon the written recommendation of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, which recommendation shall also set forth the facts relative to such loss or payment: Provided further, That the Comptroller General in all cases shall certify that the transactions, expenditures, losses, or payments appear to be free from fraud or collusion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WALSH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office bill, including the printing of some letters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. MAPES rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. MAPES. I have a bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that his matter will be reached later.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10161) authorizing the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7158. An act to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor; and

H. R. 8842. An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 125. Joint resolution to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law;

S. 2492. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1921; and

S. 1312. An act to amend the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia.

PURCHASE OF SEED FOR THE RELIEF OF FARMERS.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 2897, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules, pass the bill S. 2897, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the matter to be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2897) to authorize the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purchase of seed grain to be supplied to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, said amount to be expended under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, for the crop of 1922, to make advances or loans to farmers in the crop-failure areas of the United States, where he shall find that special need for such asistance exists, for the purchase of wheat, oats, barley, and flaxseed, for seed purposes, and, when necessary, to procure such seed and sell same to such farmers. Such advances, loans, or sales shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, including an agreement by each farmer to use the seed thus obtained by him for the production of grain or flaxseed. A first lien on the crop to be produced from seed obtained through a loan, advance, or sale made under this section shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security therefor. The total amount of such advances, loans, or sales to any one farmer shall not exceed the sum of $300. All such advances or loans shall be made through such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate. For carrying out the purposes of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, to be immediately available, and not more than $20,000 may be used in the District of Columbia or elsewhere by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall knowingly make any false representation for the purpose of obtaining an advance, loan, or sale under this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to suspend the rules may include the following amendment to the title:

Strike out the word "appropriate" in the first line of the title and insert the words "to authorize the appropriation of."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the motion to suspend rules may include a motion to amend the title which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "appropriate" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to authorize the appropriation of."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Arkansas to 20 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill carried an appropriation of $5,000,000; the bill as amended carries $1,000,000 for the purchase of seed for the farmers in these drought-stricken areas where they lost their crops. It provides that the loan shall be made on terms prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Two million dollars were advanced last year and up to the present time more than $600,000 of it has been collected. Judging from the correspondence received, there seems to be an urgent demand for the appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The hearings show that $2,000,000 were advanced and $600,000 collected. The statement of the party representing the Agricultural Department was that the probabilities were that the Government would lose the other $1,400,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. The Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the committee and stated that over $600,000 had been collected of the $1,900,000 loan, and that it was probable that other collections would be made, but he did not state definitely what amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The representative of the Agricultural Department who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations in this matter stated that they had not had a crop within four years, and that probabilities were that it was longer than four years, and that these places where they are loaning the money are not suited to raising grass and oats but adapted to grazing.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am familiar with the situation. In some localities that is true, but in some areas they have had crops. They had a fairly good crop a year ago in the western part of North Dakota, where they had in some instances as high as 20 bushels to the acre.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is it not a fact that the banks out there loaned the money to these farmers to make these crops and to buy the seed, and that they had all the seed and instead of loaning the money to the farmers the actual fact is the money was deposited in the banks and the banks gave them credit and took the money?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I understand they admitted that fact before the Appropriations Committee, that instead of the farmers getting the money the banks got it. What does the genleman say?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no knowledge of it whatever. It was loaned through the banks, and I assume the banks loaned the money to the farmers or furnished the seed. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, last year we passed an appropriation bill giving $2,000,000 for the purchase of seed for these same States. Recently we had a hearing before the Appropriations Committee as to the administration and expenditure of that fund. We found that about $50,000 of that has been spent for overhead administration expenses. We found that it cost about $130 per farmer advanced for supposed purchase of seed. We found that they loaned to about 13,900 farmers money to buy seed, and we found that they collected back of that fund about $600,000, making a loss to the Government of a million and a quarter dollars on that enterprise. We further found at this hearing that this money, or a great portion of it, did not go for the purchase of seed to the farmers themselves, but the date was so late that the farmers already had the seed by virtue of advances from the banks or merchants and business men, and these bankers who had advanced money got the cash from the Government and credited the farmers' accounts with it. Those facts appeared in the hearings before the Appropriations Committee a few days ago. We further find that not since 1916 has this particular section of our country made a success of farming, and, further, that it is a grazing and not an agricultural country; that the great majority of Government advances are to landowners.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I understood the gentleman to say that the overhead expenses amounted to about $50,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct.

Mr. BURTNESS. I have here a letter from the chairman of the seed-loan committee and the chief of that department, in which he states that the expense involved in making the loans was approximately $10,000, with about $5,000 additional for recording the chattel mortgages taken on crops as security for the repayment of loans.

I can not quite see why there should be such a difference between the recollection of the gentleman and the statement of a member of the department who was in charge of this work, or why the discrepancy between the testimony as appears from the statement.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I care not what the letter states. I am telling what appears in the hearings; and if the gentleman will take the hearings recently held before the Committee on Agriculture, on page 833, he will find that it is stated there that $50,000 approximately has all been used up in making loans, recording mortgages, and collecting those mortgages.

Mr. MANN. There has been about $30,000 expended in making the collection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Thirty thousand dollars in making the collection and the balance of it in making the loans. That is the administrative overhead charge, and it is entirely too much. If we pass this bill authorizing this $2,000,000 appropriation we must do it realizing that we get more than one-quarter, or at the most one-half, of the money back. If we are going into the alms business, let us make it general and treat all sections of the country alike. We have poverty in the big cities of the land and throughout the farming sections; and if we are going to dispense alms, let us treat them all alike, and not select four States of the Northwest to shower favors upon. Farming in that country is a failure, and will be until irrigation comes; and the longer we keep this up the greater injustice we are doing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman to the proviso in the bill that not more than $20,000 may be used in the District of Columbia and elsewhere by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act.

I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the greatest achievement of the Harding administration is the work of the Conference on Limitation of Armament as concretely embodied in the treaties submitted to the Senate by the President for ratification. This achievement reflects great credit upon the Republican Party, of which President Harding is the chief, but it is not alone a party achievement; it is a nonpartisan, American achievement, in which Senator UNDERWOOD, Democrat, cooperated with Senator LODGE, Republican, for the benefit of America and the whole world. [Applause.] Through these two Senators, representing the two great parties in this Nation, the Senate performed a constitutional function in assisting in the preparation of the treaties which it now has before it for final ratification. Theodore Roosevelt said that no man with any sense wanted war, and I think the American people feel that no man to-day who thinks with large vision can possibly oppose the greatest step toward peace which has been made since the ending of the World War.

The Senate rules permit unlimited debate, and that sometimes means more or less inconclusive talk, but I can not conceive that ultimately the Senate will vote against the treaties which embody the work of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament; I can not conceive that Democratic Senators will vote to disapprove the work of Senator UNDERWOOD, for this is not a time for party or personal politics in the Senate. Nor can I conceive that any Republican Senator will vote against these treaties and be able still to claim to be a member of that party, of which Harding, Hughes, Root, and Lodge are leaders. Should any Senator from Maryland vote against these treaties, I feel sure that he would not represent the sentiment of the people of that historic State of Maryland, whose soldiers fought under that same Washington, whose principles of Government are to-day so often misinterpreted. I feel that we here in the House, in this crucial moment of the consideration of the treaties, should let our Senators know that we stand for the treaties.

On Wednesday, November 23, 1921, here in the House I quoted from the words of the President, "Less of armament and none of war," and I said that thus while the hush of sorrow for the unknown American soldier dead still hung over us the President of the United States, speaking to all the peoples of the world, voiced, as he opened the Conference on Limitation of Armament, the aspiration and the policy of the American people. Echoing his expression of our policy of peace, throughout the land rose a prayer against war:

O God of Love, O King of Peace,
Make wars throughout the world to cease;
The wrath of sinful men restrain,
Give peace, O God, give peace again.

I rise to say to you to-day that the people of Maryland and, I believe, the whole American people are behind the President and the work of the Conference on Limitation of Armament and desire the immediate ratification of the treaties. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we try our best to have our land settled on and cultivated. We have a large area of land in the country which is not as tillable as the land in the section of the country from which I come. Men have gone out to this—I would call it—semiarid region, pledging their lives and all they have in the effort to cultivate the soil, not merely in their own interest but in the interest of the country and the whole people. They have undertaken a task commensurate with any of the tasks of the old pioneers. I sometimes have wondered at their courage and their hardihood. Comes along a time when these men, with no accumulation of property, meet with adverse climatic conditions. They can not raise a crop. In the course of time we will perhaps better learn how to handle the soil or the cultivation of the soil in those localities. I can remember back to the day when the pioneers who went to western Kansas came flocking back to the eastern portion of the country, and yet civilization and man have practically captured Kansas and the cultivation of the soil there. These men who meet these temporary failures of crops must either leave the ground there vacant or they must be helped by some one. They are asking now that we give them the money with which to buy the seed to sow. We just appropriated $20,000,000 to furnish corn for consumption and for seed to the starving in Russia. We have frequently appropriated money to aid where there was famine or drought in foreign lands. Here it is close at home among our own people, and I like to think that the great mass of American citizenship and the great country and the Government are willing in time of necessity to give a man another chance, not to drive him out to starvation, but to give him a chance to sow the seed and cultivate the soil and, let us hope, reap the crops. I think the people there have been extremely moderate in their requests and I believe that we are big enough to do this. [Applause.]

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill should be termed a bill for the relief of the Nonpartisan League of North Dakota. The reason I make that statement is because I have read the Senate hearings on the bill, and there are 29 letters and telegrams printed in those hearings asking for legislation of this kind. Every one of them is from the State of North Dakota. I have not opposed and do not expect to oppose constructive legislation for the benefit of the farming interests of the country. I gladly voted for the bill which passed the House several months ago directing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit up to $25,000,000 with the farm loan banks during periods when their funds run low and they are waiting to sell their bonds, such sums of money to be repaid to the Treasury when the bonds are sold. That legislation is working well and will not cost the Treasury of the United States any loss and is wise and constructive relief. I voted for the provision amending the War Finance Corporation act so as to enlarge and extend its facilities for making agricultural and live stock advances, and as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency I assisted in every way I could to get that legislation passed. It is along proper lines; the Government will not lose any money by this operation, and the loans which the corporation is making are materially relieving the financial pressure in the agricultural and live stock States.

Let us see what the War Finance Corporation is doing in the State of North Dakota. I received a letter a few days ago from Mr. A. W. McLean, one of the managing directors of the War Finance Corporation, and he says that up to the date of his letter—February 14, 1922—there has been loaned for agricultural and live-stock advances to banking and financial institutions in the United States $154,000,000, and something over $48,000,000 to cooperative organizations of farmers throughout the country. The State of North Dakota has borrowed of this amount $12,460,000, which is more than any other State except the State of Iowa, which State has borrowed $19,500,000, in round numbers.

We all know that the State of Iowa, next to the State of Texas, produces the largest amount of agricultural products of any State in the Union, and naturally we would expect large loans there; but the State of North Dakota, which takes much smaller rank in the value of its agricultural products, is ahead of even the State of Texas in this borrowing from the War Finance Corporation, Texas having borrowed $12,313,000. I submit that these figures show that we have provided ample means to take care of the North Dakota and Montana situation without making a direct appropriation of this kind. The overburdened taxpayer is needing some relief himself, and we will certainly never be able to give it to him if we keep on voting money out of the Public Treasury. I therefore shall vote against this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield some of his time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman only one more speech on his side?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Arkansas has 12 minutes and I have 8. Will he use part of his time?

Mr. JACOWAY. Has the gentleman one more speech?

Mr. HAUGEN. Probably two. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. RIDDICK].

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, if it were not for the fact that there is a real emergency in this western country, I would not ask for this legislation. In the State of Montana there are 30,000,000 acres of agricultural land, a section as large as the State of Illinois or of New York. Some of this agricultural land is equal to the best farm land in the United States. Land-hungry people have gone to that western country from every State in the Union——

Mr. JACOWAY. If the gentleman will permit a moment. I stated there was only one more speech, whereas I find there will be two more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIDDICK. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask that this be not taken out of the time. The gentleman from Arkansas simply wanted to correct an error which he had made, and I hope it will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Montana. The gentleman from Arkansas inadvertently stated that there would be only one other speech on this side. He was under a misapprehension, as he later ascertained that there would be two, and he wanted to correct that error. We want to tote fair in the matter.

Mr. RIDDICK. People in search of homes of their own have gone to Montana and other western country from every State in the Union. As a rule, they are people of very limited means. Severe and unusual drougths have temporarily blighted portions of that country for a period of years, until of my own personal knowledge I am able to advise you that there is actual want and suffering, and unless relief is afforded there is certain to follow more of real suffering that should appeal to the Congress.

In those sections the land and homes and all the other property is mortgaged to the limit. All assets have been exhausted except the fine courage, the splendid determination, and the eternal hope of those pioneer people. They do not want to abandon their homes and depopulate that country and add to the numbers of destitute unemployed. They are willing to continue uncomplainingly to face hardships and privations, to labor long hours, and to courageously carry on in their laudable efforts to make for themselves happy farm homes in that new country, which is a part of the United States of America. But they have expended all of their means and all of their credit. They have the land and the tools and the will to work, but they have no seed for spring planting, and they have no way to get any, unless the Federal Government will now come to their aid. They ask no charity or alms. They do ask a modest loan for each needy farmer, who will repay the loan as soon as he will raise a crop. Without this aid their last hope is gone. Homes will be lost to them forever. There will be hunger and suffering, and want will be actually felt right here in our own land, and whole sections will be depopulated.

I much regret the fact that every speech that has been made against this measure has come from the Democratic side of this House, and that the Democratic floor leader is seeking to unite his party to defeat this bill. The northwestern farmer has learned during the past eight years to expect little interest in his welfare and section of the country from the party that looks to the South for its leadership. But in a case like this, where there is actual want and suffering, it seems to me that sectional lines and party lines should be forgotten in a general desire to deal as generously with our own people in their hour of need as we have been ready to help those in Russia.

This measure provides that as much as $300 may be loaned to farmers who have suffered crop losses, and who have no means or credit whereby they may secure seed to carry on further farming operations. The loan is to be secured by a lien on the crops to be raised. The loans are to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture under regulations he shall prescribe. There are many precedents for this kind of legislation to prevent suffering. Last year a similar loan was made, and much suffering and great losses were prevented, and nearly half of the money loaned has been paid back into the Treasury. It is thought this loan will be the last that will be necessary in this section of the country. We have not loaned, but have given generously to alleviate suffering and save life in Russia and other foreign countries, and we can not in justice turn a deaf ear to actual suffering among our own people and their requests for a loan, which they will repay, so they may feed themselves, and save their homes, and work out their own salvation.

The particular section of country where these loans are needed are in portions of the Dakotas and in eastern Montana. In some of these sections there have been four successive years of drouth. That country is not settled through real estate dealers, but by men and women of all the States, who have read Uncle Sam's official documents, and who then have migrated to that western country and settled upon Government homestead land to satisfy their longing to own a farm home that they could call their own. Most of these people are poor, and most of them are young folks. They lack the money to purchase live stock or machinery to carry on diversified farming, erect silos, or to carry them through bad years. They are compelled by the force of circumstances to confine their labor largely to the raising of wheat as a quick money crop.

Some sections of Montana hold the world's record at national and international grain shows for raising the finest grades of wheat, oats, barley, corn, flax, and timothy in the world. First prizes have been taken by Montana grain in competition with all other States and with all countries of the world. Moreover, for a 10-year period immediately preceding the drougth years the official statistics published by the United States Department of Agriculture show that Montana holds the record for larger yields per acre of wheat, oats, rye, potatoes, and hay than any other State in the Union.

In view of those established facts, it is not strange that people flocked to that country from every State and sought to make a successful farm home for themselves on Uncle Sam's domain, in a section that had made such a remarkable record for agricultural production. In addition to its mountains and forests and ranges, Montana has 30,000,000 acres of farm land, a territory as large as the State of Illinois, Wisconsin, or New York, and over that vast territory are many varieties of soil, altitude, rainfall, and climatic conditions.

Although this great territory was formerly all regarded as an arid country and a part of the great American desert, unsuitable for farming, it has been demonstrated that parts of the State have land and climate unexcelled by any other State in the Union for quality and quantity of crop production. But during the past five years in parts of the State there have been some most unusual and distressing conditions. There has been a new low record made for lack of rainfall. In some sections crops that gave promise of generous yield were later eaten up completely by grasshoppers. During last summer, at the time when the wheat kernels were in the milk, there were several days of unprecedented hot and dry winds that shriveled up the kernels, resulting in complete failure of the crop to produce a bushel of wheat. In still other sections fine fields of wheat already turning a golden brown and almost ready to be harvested, were swept by terrific hailstorms and the crops completely destroyed.

During the war, at the request of the Government, these farmers strained their resources and their credit and the resources and credit of their banker and merchant friends in order to raise grain more abundantly to help win the war. This they continued to do despite the fact that the Government fixed the price of the wheat they raised at less than the market price, and in some cases less than the cost of production, while at the same time permitting the prices of everything the farmer had to buy to soar without limit. The droughts following the war period of high costs have brought many of these farmers to absolute ruin and to a state where there is absolute hunger and lack of necessary clothing and real suffering. They are about to lose their homes, and they have no place to turn. They literally have no more assets and can secure no more credits from any source unless the Government gives aid. The banks and the merchants can go no further. The State has authorized the counties to aid, and the counties have given aid until they can go no further. The War Finance Corporation, through reconstruction legislation passed by this Congress, has been able to splendidly meet the needs of the larger live-stock men of the West, of the sugar-beet raisers, and of the cotton planters of the South, but have been absolutely unable to give loans to the small farmers in drought-stricken sections of the Northwest who have no liquidable assets as a basis for credit.

As a public policy it would be a mistake to permit the farmers who have settled upon and made their homes upon the land in these pioneer sections of country to leave their homes destitute and to add to the suffering and the unemployment in the country, as they will be compelled to do unless aid is given. No one dare say in the light of the agricultural experience of this country that this or that locality will not permit of successful farming. Such things were said of parts of Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and of Montana, that have since become recognized as among the successful farming sections of our country. Some of these sections were totally abandoned and again resettled. True, it is costly to make the experiment to determine how to successfully farm in new and undeveloped country, and it is a costly experiment sometimes to discover if a country will make a success as a farming country. It is costly not alone in money, but in sacrifice, in hardships, and in the hardest kind of toil, as I can personally testify as one who has developed a home from the open land of the public domain. The western home seekers are willing to make the attempt, and as a public policy they should be given every reasonable encouragement. In view of the unusual hardships that have overtaken some of them, that have now brought them to actual suffering and want, it is time for the Government to step in and give a loan to those who still desire to continue the experiment and who have not the seed wherewith to continue longer. There is precedent for this kind of legislation. A similar loan was made last year in certain sections of the West. It accomplished untold good in preventing loss of homes and actual suffering and in preventing a depopulation of large sections of country. Nearly one-half of that loan has been paid back into the Treasury, and practically all would have been paid back had it not been for the losses occasioned by hail, grasshoppers, hot winds, and drought, all of which were unusual and extraordinary conditions that were met by these pioneer farmers last year. Loss and actual suffering will be saved, the country will not be depopulated, homes will not be abandoned, if this bill is passed promptly, and most, if not all, the money loaned in this worthy cause will promptly be repaid, and in the hearts of thousands of loyal American citizens there will be established increased love and regard for their country, which came to their aid generously in the hour of their distress and need.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House. I think in the light of the evidence before the Committee on Agriculture there is no doubt but what a very serious situation confronts many farmers of the Northwest, but at the same time I think it will dawn upon every man who has given any study to the agricultural interests of this country that a serious condition confronts the farmers all over the country. Now, an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill came into the House last year and we appropriated $2,000,000 with which to purchase seed for the farmers of the Northwest, and I do not want any Member to deceive himself by this bill. It is a question of whether you are going to embark on this policy or not, because talk about this being a loan, it is going to be a gift, and it is a question, if you are going to embark upon that policy why make the farmers of the Northwest wards of the Government and the farmers of the other parts of our country not only not the wards of the Government but contribute their share of the taxes to pay this. There is a bill pending before the Committee on Agriculture now to relieve the farmers who were the beneficiaries of the appropriation of last year of the $2,000,000 from the payment of this seed bill. If this becomes the law, these same fellows next year will be before the Congress again wanting to be relieved of this situation.

Mr. RIDDICK. I want to say to the gentleman that the bill pending before the Committee on Agriculture provides for the relief of those who had an absolute failure this year, and more than one-half——

Mr. KINCHELOE. Absolutely relieves those who had a failure. Then others want to put in an amendment reimbursing those who have already paid in money and give it back to them. This bill as it originally passed the Senate—we know how legislation is conducted over there—provided for $5,000,000 as it came to our committee, and the other day the Agricultural Committee, not unanimously, however, reported this bill to the House carrying $2,000,000, with the provision that not over $1,000,000 should be used for the purchase of feed for live stock.

One man came before the Committee on Agriculture carrying a message from some of the farmers of the Northwest, saying, "If you do pass this bill limiting the amount to $300 to each farmer, do not compel him to buy seed with it, but give him a part of that $300 with which to buy stock." I live in a section where the agricultural interests are in bad shape. I have seen the tenants of the tobacco fields of Kentucky and Tennessee absolutely on the verge of starvation, not making as much as 20 cents a day. Every man here who represents an agricultural district knows the condition of the farmers. As a Member of Congress are you going to put the hands of the farmers of the Northwest into the Government's Treasury in order that they may be relieved, granting that they are in bad shape, and take the money from your farmers who are already overburdened with taxes and get no relief at all? I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I am for all agricultural legislation that is of a constructive character and that will do something to relieve the great agricultural interests of the country, no matter whether they live in the Northwest or in the East or the South or the central part of the United States, but we should not embark upon a policy like this. One of the other bills that is pending before our committee is to fix the price of agricultural products. These same people are for that. They say to you, "Give us money to buy seed; let us raise the crop, and then guarantee a minimum price for the crops that we raise, and if the law of supply and demand does not bring that minimum price, then Uncle Sam shall go in his pocket again and make the guaranty good." That is the policy you are establishing. As I say, do not deceive yourselves. Whenever you vote for this as a loan you are voting it as a gift. That is the question for you to decide on this proposition. As a true friend to all the farmers of the country I can not support this discriminatory legislation.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, in all seriousness, that it is high time that those of us here, and particularly the responsible majority, who are disposed to make even a pretense of economy should stop and inquire about this legislation, "Quo vadis—whither are we drifting?" This is the third time that precisely this character of relief has been suggested for that particular section of the country. Out of the President's fund, appropriated during the war if I remember correctly, there was set aside a certain amount—I do not recall now just what amount—to be loaned under the same conditions practically that are provided for in this bill. And, then, last year the Congress itself made a direct appropriation, as has been pointed out, of $2,000,000. Now, again, it is proposed this year to make an appropriation of $1,000,000. For what? To buy seed. Upon what basis? According to the testimony given before the Appropriations Committee by Mr. Warburton, 80 per cent of those who availed themselves of the fund last year were landowners. Now, there is not a word of testimony introduced before the Committee on Appropriations or, so far as I can ascertain, before the Committee on Agriculture to show that those landowners have exhausted their credit. Why is it the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] can not present some facts to show destitution, if destitution exists? What more? It is only an exceptional year that grain crops can be made in this part of the country. It is not a grain-producing section. The same gentleman whom I quoted a few minutes ago said it was a grazing section. Of course, I suppose grain can be grown there. You could grow oranges in the potato region of Maine and crowd out the potatoes if you were willing to pay the price. But is that statesmanship? Bear in mind there is no destitution shown here. Bear in mind it was shown that last year before these loans were made the farmers had received credit from the banks, had borrowed money from their local banks with which to buy the wheat and other grain seeds, and by the time the Government fund got there they already had their seed on their own credit, and this Government fund simply operated to repay to the banks some of the credit that had been extended. The same thing will be true again this year, I dare say. And there is no way of getting all this money back.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] just a short while ago reported from the Committee on Agriculture a Senate bill designed to wipe out the debt that the Government holds against every man who did not make 5 bushels of grain, as I recall. In other words, it defines as a crop failure one that did not make 5 bushels per acre, and relieves the borrower of liability.

How far are we going with this, gentlemen? Where is the end to be? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] spoke of it as though it were a case of suffering. The testimony does not show any such thing. There is nothing in the record to indicate it. It is really a matter of extending direct credits without there being even a showing that direct credit is extended. Already, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] pointed out, one of the States at least had been loaned large sums of money to be expended in this way. It is time, it seems to me, that there should be a cessation of this holding up the hands of the Government along these lines. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, beginning at about the one hundredth meridian there is a great territory where the settler has been called upon to carry on a great experiment. Can the country be farmed or must it be left to the uses of grazing wholly? From time to time crops have failed. When the failure was only for a year or two the people have been able to tide over the time of stress, but in the Dakotas and in Montana there has been a succession of failures, and the failures have come at a time when costs were high and what products were produced were very low in value. And as to some of the area in those States it is a question whether the settlers, homesteaders in a large number of cases, are to abandon their homes, abandon the struggle, or are to be given an opportunity to pursue the experiment that means so much to the country, much more to the country as a whole than to any one of them individually or all of them collectively.

Last year we appropriated $2,000,000 to loan to buy seed; and I think it speaks well for those people in a year of drought, they have repaid $600,000 of it and are steadily repaying. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] says that the funds we appropriated last year in some cases were paid to banks. That is true. The Secretary of Agriculture gave notice immediately upon the passage of the bill that where moneys were advanced to these settlers for the purchase of seed, those advancing them would be reimbursed in worthy cases. It was necessary to do that in order to have the seed purchased and supplied and sown; otherwise there might have been a delay that would have prevented cropping. That procedure was a wise one. It was necessary under the circumstances.

I hope we shall not be called upon to continue these loans, a part of which we shall inevitably lose. But we have been pretty liberal in other parts of the country. As some gentlemen who have already spoken have said, we have used some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 of the people's money for the eradication of the boll weevil. We have spent millions of the people's money in the eradication of the Texas tick, and properly, for it is a scourge that ought to be eradicated in the interest of all the people. But we have given those funds. We have not loaned them. We have asked no man who has received the benefit of those funds to repay any part of them.

Here we are simply making a loan to these people in the hope that this small loan, which can not be over $300 in any individual case, will tide them over this trying period, will enable them to remain on their lands and fight out this contest, which will, we hope, prove that that great area need not be abandoned by the home builder, but may be utilized for the establishment of permanently prosperous homes, made prosperous by mixed farming. [Applause.]

COAST GUARD STATION ON GREEN BAY, WIS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2874) to authorize the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the coast of Green Bay at or in the vicinity of Strawberry Passage, in Door County, Wis.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this is to authorize a Coast Guard station at Green Bay, Wis. It is usual to carry a limitation of cost in bills of this character. There seems to be no limitation of cost in this bill. I notice that the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the cost of the buildings and equipment at $35,000. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill willing to agree to an amendment providing that the limit of cost of the station buildings and equipment thereof shall be $35,000?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it is the testimony of the captain commandant of the Coast Guard Service that that will be the limit of cost, and I see no particular objection to putting that amendment into the bill.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the coast of Green Bay at or in the vicinity of Strawberry Passage, in Door County, Wis., in such locality as the captain commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN: At the end of the bill add the following: "At a limit of cost for station buildings and equipment thereof of $35,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INDIANA HARBOR, IND.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2993) authorizing a modification of the adopted project for Indiana Harbor, Ind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2993, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the project adopted in the river and harbor act of June 25, 1910, for the improvement and maintenance of Indiana Harbor, Ind., is hereby so modified as to eliminate that part of the projected inner canal extending from the northwest corner of the southwest quarter of section 20, township 37 north, range 9 west of the second principal meridian, westwardly to Lake George; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to quitclaim and convey to local interests, on such terms and conditions as he may deem just and equitable, the rights of way which have been heretofore donated by local interests to the United States for the said section of the canal and for connecting the said Lake George with Wolf Lake.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I understand this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The bill passed the Senate unanimously and is also unanimously reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REQUEST TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed an editorial published in the Boston Evening Transcript on March 3 entitled "Our Republican House."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Will the Chair state the purpose?

The SPEAKER. To publish in the RECORD an editorial from the Boston Transcript entitled "Our Republican House."

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, it has not been customary to insert newspaper editorials in the RECORD. What is there special about this?

Mr. TINKHAM. It has often been done.

Mr. MANN. I have seen it done several times in the course of 25 years, but I have seen it objected to usually.

Mr. TINKHAM. The honorable Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] had an editorial published in the RECORD a few days ago.

Mr. GARNER. It is a splendid article; I read it myself, and I think it ought to go into the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts read an editorial the other day and said it was an editorial after he read it. We all thought it was original. This is on the bonus question, is it not?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is not. It expresses an opinion of the honorable Members of this Congress, and should be read by them.

Mr. MANN. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 7, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thou art the author of our being. In Thee we live, move, and have our being. We recognize the blessings vouchsafed unto us day by day, and we do ask that the wisdom which cometh from Thee may always be at our command, and that we may willingly obey every impulse which leads us constantly to recognize our dependence upon Thee. Give us Thy presence this morning, and through every day manifest Thyself as our Father loving us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, February 23, 1922, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of ratification of the four-power treaty, which was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate when the treaties were reported to the Senate, may be read by the Secretary, so that it may appear in the RECORD. I make the request because many Senators have asked me if I knew where the proposed reservation reported by the committee could be found. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

"Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification:

"The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to state, for the information of the Senators who may be present and so that it may appear in the RECORD, that the reservation which has just been read by the Secretary at the desk appears on the last page, page 8, of the Senate document which is called Executive N, and which I think has been distributed on the desks of Senators this morning.

HIGH COMMISSIONER IN HAITI.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have here a protest signed on behalf of the Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society in relation to the alleged Executive creation of the office of high commissioner in Haiti. I ask that the accompanying letter and the protest itself be printed in the RECORD and referred to the special committee appointed to investigate conditions in Haiti.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying communication were referred to the Special Committee to Inquire into the Occupation and Administration of the Territories of the Republic of Haiti and the Dominican Republic by the Forces of the United States, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAITI-SANTO DOMINGO INDEPENDENCE SOCIETY,
Washington Office, March 7, 1922.

To the Senate of the United States:

The Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society respectfully submits to the Senate of the United States its protest against the Executive creation of the office of "high commissioner in Haiti, with the rank of ambassador extraordinary," without authority of Congress, and against the appointment to this office, should its creation be judged constitutional, of Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, of the United States Marine Corps, without the advice and consent of the Senate.

By order of the executive committee of the Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society.

HELENA HILL WEED, Secretary.

Without the advice and consent of the Senate, Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, high commissioner, clothed with extraordinary ambassadorial powers, has left for Haiti to assume the duties of his post. The following announcement appeared in the press February 19, 1922 (Washington Post, Official Service News), and the facts were confirmed by State Department officials, who also stated that this nomination would not be sent to the Senate for confirmation:

"Quite unusual are the powers given to Brig. Gen. John H. Russell, of the Marine Corps, by the instructions issued to him by the State Department in connection with his designation as 'high commissioner in Haiti with the rank of ambassador extraordinary,' this designation having been given him after his recent appointment as special representative of the President in that country.

"He will have, in effect, plenary authority over all the affairs of the country, both civil and military, including the marine forces and the gendarmerie d'Haiti, and of the United States legation, which will be in the immediate custody of the chargé d'affaires.

"All officials from this country appointed in accordance with the treaty of September, 1915, as well as the native appointees, and including the collector of customs, financial adviser, sanitary and public-health officers, etc., will come under the high commissioner, who will be in complete control of the country."

Such an appointment is without precedent in American history. True, special envoys, commissioners, etc., have been appointed whose nominations have not been referred to the Senate, but these have invariably been for purposes of investigation or to perform certain distinctly specified duties; and the authority of the President to make even such appointments has been questioned and never definitely established.

The appointment of an American high commissioner over a free and independent Republic, whose technical independence is still recognized by the United States in common with every other country, is the more extraordinary in that it is made before the Senate has accepted the report of the select committee which is still investigating our occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo. The appointment therefore precedes the creation of such an office by Congress.

The appointment of Brig. Gen. Russell to be absolute dictator over a friendly and inoffensive neighbor people is the more unjustifiable in that his previous administrations, covering three years as commander in chief of the forces of occupation in Haiti, are the subject of grave indictment by the Haitian people. The abuses during his administration are still under investigation by the Senate select committee.

It is significant, however, that Gen. Russell, alone among the various commanders in Haiti since 1915, has not yet been called upon to appear before the committee for examination.

Two days after the announcement by the State Department that Brig. Gen. John H. Russell had been appointed by the President as "high commissioner in Haiti, with plenary authority, as the personal representative of the President of the United States, over all the affairs of that country," the announcement was made by the Navy Department that this appointment was made in conformity with the recommendation of the special committee of the Senate which had just returned from an investigation of the American occupation of Haiti.

This officer, it is to be noted, is to be in command of all the affairs of the country, both civil and military, including:

1. The American marine forces of occupation.
2. The gendarmerie of Haiti.
3. The United States Legation and its minister, appointed and confirmed by the Senate as the official representative of the United States in Haiti.
4. The American treaty officials appointed in accordance with the treaty of 1915.
5. The American financial adviser of Haiti.
6. The American collector of customs.
7. The Haitian officials appointed in accordance with the treaty of 1915.
8. The Haitian sanitary officers.
9. The Haitian public health officers.

The Haiti-Santo Domingo Independence Society points out that no such officer as "high commissioner in Haiti," with the sweeping powers named in this appointment, has ever been created by any competent authority in the United States.

No such office is created or contemplated in the treaty of 1915, even supposing that treaty is valid, a matter that is open to gravest doubt, in view of the established fact that this treaty was imposed on the Haitian people by military force and financial coercion.

No power was ever given to the Special Committee of Investigation, appointed by the Senate to investigate for that body the military occupation of Haiti and Santo Domingo, to put into effect the judgments of its individual members, through the executive departments of the Government, prior to its report to the Senate and to congressional action thereon.

No power has ever been invested in any of the executive departments of the United States Government to invade Haiti, an unoffending, friendly nation, whose independence and sovereignty we, in common with all the nations of the civilized world, recognize, or to wage war upon her, occupy, and govern her as a conquered nation.

No power has ever been given to the President of the United States to appoint, nor does any precedent exist in the history of the country for the appointment of "an ambassador extraordinary" to a friendly nation, with which we are at peace, to govern that country "as the personal representative of the President of the United States."

Even did the authority exist for the creation of such an office—and this society denies such authority in the absence of congressional action—this society would protest the appointment of Brig. Gen. John H. Russell to fill the post, on the following grounds:

His two administrations, as chief of the American Forces of Occupation in Haiti, are the subject of gravest indictment by the Haitian people and are still under investigation by the special Senate committee.

These two periods of duty, as the responsible head of the marine forces of occupation, covered the periods from November 27, 1917, until December 7, 1918, and from October 1, 1919, until January of the present year. It was during these periods that the following serious abuses are alleged to have occurred:

1. Illegal corvee or forced, unpaid road labor, involving abuse, imprisonment, and illegal killings of native Haitians.
2. "Indiscriminate killings" of untried native prisoners by marines.
3. Illegal imprisonment and torture of native Haitians with no charges against them.
4. Illegal imprisonment, at hard labor, for long periods of time, of natives who were only under suspicion of crimes.
5. Illegal imprisonment, at hard labor, of natives who were only suspected of opposing the American occupation of their country.
6. Jim-crowing of the cultured and intellectual classes of Haitians; this humiliation extending to the altars of their churches.
7. Overriding of the native courts by marine provost courts.
8. Suppression of legitimate criticism of the occupation and of all opposition to it by an arbitrary, illegal administration of martial law.
9. Using the military pressure to secure from the helpless Haitian officials special financial privileges for American private interests and for agricultural exploiters.
10. The imposition upon the Haitian people by military force of the constitution of 1918 by means of an illegal plebiscite, fraudulently carried out by the marines under his command.

This rape of the Haitian constitution was frankly demanded by the American agricultural interests that sought to exploit Haiti by securing ownership in the land. It was planned by Assistant Secretary Franklin Roosevelt by his own boast and was carried out under Col. John H. Russell's personal command, in the face of the protests of the Haitian people and the pleas of Americans living in Haiti that the "plebiscite" be postponed until the real facts of the situation could be presented to the authorities at Washington. According to the testimony before the special Senate committee Col. Russell not only refused to allow protests to be telegraphed to Washington and the facts of the case to be made clear, but he refused to send a statement himself giving the truth of the situation.

Brig. Gen. Eli K. Cole, in his testimony before the Senate committee (p. 694 et seq.), said that the reason the constitution of 1918 was "ratified" by means of a "plebiscite" was that he was satisfied that no elected national assembly would ever agree to the provisions demanded by the United States, and that it was necessary, in order to carry out the plans and policies of the United States in Haiti, to have a constitution adopted in some way embodying these provisions.

There were three provisions to which the Haitian people were unalterably opposed, and Gen. Russell was the officer who, with an iron hand, blocked all efforts of those who sought to explain their real meaning to Washington prior to their enforced adoption by the illegal "plebiscite."

1. The article granting to foreigners the same rights as Haitians in the Haitian courts was strongly opposed, although this article might have been compromised had not the remaining two articles been insisted upon.

2. Every element in the Haitian nation was unalterably opposed to granting to foreigners the right to own land. This was the absolutely unsurmountable objection which no power could overcome in the elected assembly and resulted in the illegal "plebiscite."

3. The special article ratifying and legalizing all the acts of the occupation and making it impossible for the Government or people, collectively or individually, to secure reparation for injury or loss as a result of the invasion and occupation of Haiti, was written into the Haitian constitution by the military force of the armed marines under the command of Gen. John H. Russell—the same officer who is now nominated by the President to govern Haiti as his personal representative. This article reads as follows:

SPECIAL ARTICLE.

"All the acts of the United States during its military occupation of Haiti are ratified and legalized.

"No Haitian may be liable for civil or criminal suits for any act committed by virtue of the orders of the occupation or under its authority.

"The acts of the courts-martial of the occupation, without in any way affecting the right of pardon, will not be subject to revision.

(The right of pardon was later taken over by the occupation.)

"The acts of the Executive power (the President) up to the promulgation of the present constitution, are equally ratified and legalized."

As a result of his part in conducting the "plebiscite" under these conditions, and of the fact that he participated, as chief of the occupation, in the attempted coercion of the President of Haiti to secure special financial privileges for the National City Bank, in 1920, he stands convicted, according to the testimony before the special Senate committee, of participation in acts which have been characterized as "international brigandage."

In addition to the indefensibility of the invasion and occupation itself these two acts of violation of the sovereignty of Haiti, as well as the forcible dispersal of the Haitian National Assembly in 1917 by armed American marines, are the insurmountable obstacles to any understanding between Haiti and the United States.

This society contends that no officer who participated in these indefensible acts should be sent to Haiti, even in the temporary period that must intervene between this time and the nearest date that the forces of occupation can be withdrawn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Committee for Treaty Ratification, held at the Hotel McAlpin, New York City, March 1, 1922, favoring the prompt ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of Richard J. Harden Camp, No. 2, United Spanish War Veterans, of Washington, D. C., praying for the prompt passage of House bill 4, providing increased pensions for widows of veterans of the Spanish War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Committee for Treaty Ratification, held at the Hotel McAlpin, New York City, March 1, 1922, favoring the prompt ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE FOR TREATY RATIFICATION,
Office of the Secretary.

Resolutions adopted at a meeting held in the Hotel McAlpin, New York, March 1, 1922, submitted by the committee to the President and Senate of the United States.

Whereas the conference of representatives of the United States and those of eight other nations called to consider the limitation of naval armaments and the problems of the Pacific, after three months' deliberation, under the wise and efficient leadership of President Harding and Secretary of State Hughes, has agreed upon a number of important international treaties. Six of these, in which the United States is a party, have been submitted by the President to the Senate of the United States for its constitutional approval; and

Whereas one of these treaties—between the United States, the British Empire, Japan, France, and Italy—provides for the reduction of naval armaments by the destruction of a large number of capital ships and the fixing of a ratio of naval establishments between the parties and the maximum number and strength of such ships to be possessed by each power during a period of 10 years, thus inaugurating an era of naval limitation in lieu of competition in naval establishments hitherto prevailing, a treaty which Secretary Hughes has declared "ends, absolutely ends, the race in competition of naval armament. At the same time it leaves the relative security of the great naval powers unimpaired"; and

Whereas another of such treaties adopts rules and regulations restricting the operation of submarines in time of war, making impossible such outrages upon common humanity as the destruction of the Lusitania, except at the cost of international outlawry, and further establishes rules against the use of noxious and poisonous gases; and

Whereas by another of these treaties made between the United States, Great Britain, Japan, and France, the parties agree to respect each other's rights in their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific, and agree to meet in conference to discuss any controversy which may arise between them respecting such rights, and in the event of any external aggression upon the rights of any of the parties to communicate fully and frankly with each other in order to determine what action shall be taken in view of such exigency, and which treaty, upon ratification, is to supersede the existing treaty creating the Anglo-Japanese alliance; and

Whereas other of such treaties bring to an end the policy of aggression by other nations upon the sovereignty of China and provide for the recognition of the unimpaired sovereignty of that country, and confirm the policy of equal opportunity for all nations in their trade and commerce with China, provide for a revision of her import duties, and establish a commission of the nine powers to deal with alleged infringements of the "open-door" agreements; and

Whereas a treaty between the United States and Japan settles the disputed question of the right of the United States to equal rights with Japan in the use of the island of Yap for ocean cable purposes, and also to equal rights with members of the League of Nations in the mandated islands of the Pacific north of the Equator; and

Whereas all of these treaties supplement each other and together constitute "a great and successful effort to diminish the burdens of peace and to render more remote the horrors of war"; and

Whereas the President of the United States in submitting these treaties to the United States Senate stated: "Either these treaties must have your cordial sanction or every proclaimed desire to promote peace and prevent war becomes a hollow mockery":

Resolved, That such treaties constitute great and important steps toward insuring world peace by providing for the peaceful settlement of questions which otherwise might disturb amicable relations between nations and by ending international competition in the building of navies and all its inevitable burdens and evil consequences.

Resolved further, That this committee does hereby emphatically commend the work of the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments and most earnestly urges the Senate of the United States promptly to ratify the treaties agreed upon by such conference, and as submitted to the Senate by the President of the United States.

In behalf of George W. Wickersham, chairman.

CHARLES S. MACFARLAND, Secretary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Woodson Post, No. 185, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, at Yates Center, Kans., favoring the passage of the so-called Morgan bill, providing increased pensions for veterans of the Civil War and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the State executive committee of the American Legion, Department of New York, at New York City, on February 25, 1922, praying for the prompt passage of the so-called Langley bill providing proper hospitalization covering the needs of wounded ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Evans and sundry other citizens of Columbus, Shepard, and Godfe, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I offer a resolution for reference. The resolution was offered yesterday afternoon, read and objected to. It seeks an investigation with reference to the charge that certain corrupt influences had been exercised to restrain Senators from voting to seat the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY]. I have no particular choice of the committee to which it shall go. I suggest, if there is no objection, that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the merits of the proposition and see whether the committee think an investigation should be had. Then, if they report favorably, the resolution can go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to recommend the expenditure of the money.

I may be wrong about it, but this is the view I have always taken with reference to these various resolutions. I think they ought to be referred first to the committee that passes upon the merits involved in the resolution. Then, if that committee reports and recommends the adoption of the resolution, it should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with reference to the financial expenditure involved. Otherwise, I have no objection whatever to the reference of the resolution as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no preference. I hope that the committee to which it may go will see fit to report it. It is not fair, it is not decent, for some Senator who wants to excuse his vote in this matter to pretend that he was beset by corrupt influences and that corrupt influences were exerted to compel Senators to vote one way or the other. A Senator may vote as he pleases, but after he has done so let him carry the responsibility for so voting without trying to besmirch the integrity of every other Senator who differs from him.

I want to see this resolution reported and the Senator who makes that sort of a charge given an opportunity to make good, or else let us determine that he had no information on which to base the charges. Therefore I do not want the resolution to go to a committee that is going to chloroform it; and I very greatly fear we will never hear of it if it goes to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree absolutely with the Senator from Arkansas with reference to the merits of the resolution. I can not conceive of the Committee on Privileges and Elections stifling or attempting to stifle the resolution. If I thought that would be the case, I would not favor its going there at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. I feel absolutely certain that the Senator from Washington feels that way about it. I have an apprehension, which may be absolutely unfounded, but I am not going to protest about where it shall go. However, I do intend to insist later on that we shall get some kind of a report on the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is entirely right in that, and I will vote with him. If the committee does not act on it within a reasonable time, I shall vote to discharge it from the consideration of the resolution.

Let me say that I voted to refer the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I voted that way on the theory I have just expressed, that the resolution should go to the committee which deals with the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections if the Senator thinks we will get a report from that committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator from Arkansas has no objection, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The resolution (S. Res. 252) was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Whereas by unanimous consent, first obtained, the junior Senator from Washington, Mr. POINDEXTER, on the 3d day of February, 1922, caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a letter by him written to a constituent, Mr. Thomas Marshall, of the State of Washington; and

Whereas in said letter the said Senator charges that certain malign and unlawful influences were used, or attempted to be used, to prevent Senators from voting to declare that TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY was a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan and entitled to his seat, a resolution so to declare the said TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY entitled to his seat being then pending in the Senate. Among other charges in said letter appears the following paragraphs:

"Various false assertions have been made as to influences brought to bear to secure votes in NEWBERRY'S behalf in the Senate. I notice a detailed statement in that connection published in several Washington State papers as to my own vote. This statement is libelous and false from beginning to end, as no such influences were brought to bear and no such statements or anything resembling them or anything to that effect were made to me.

"On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY. This may be referred to in more detail later on."

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chair appoint a special committee of three Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Washington, Mr. POINDEXTER.

Resolved further, That the committee be authorized to subpœna witnesses, send for and examine books and papers, and administer oaths, and do all things necessary to procure the evidence in this case, and the expenses hereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

THE PNEUMATIC TUBE SYSTEM.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that there may be placed in the RECORD the views of the three members of the Postal Commission in reference to the pneumatic tube system.

There being no objection, the views referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY REPORT ON PNEUMATIC TUBES.

The following is quoted from a former report, July 26, 1921:

The pneumatic tubes have been a subject of a greater number of investigations by congressional and departmental commissions than any other postal facility, and in practically every instance reports have been submitted opposing as well as favoring the tubes. Their use in New York was abandoned after a thorough investigation by unbiased and unprejudiced postal experts. Those employed by this commission did not consider the question of the cost of the tubes but only the question as to whether mail could be expedited by their use. It is admitted that a small percentage of the mail could be expedited by pneumatic tubes, but the quantity expedited does not warrant the enormous expenditure necessary to obtain the service. The cost of tubes as compared to automobile service can best be illustrated by the fact that letter mail comprises about 12 per cent of the entire volume of mail. When the tubes were in use in New York less than 50 per cent of the letter mail, or 6 per cent of the entire volume of mail, was handled by this means of transportation. It is claimed that approximately 450,000 letters may be expedited daily by the tubes in New York City. The majority report shows at the time of their use 10,000,000 letters were transported daily on two occasions. If only 450,000, or 4½ per cent, would be actually advanced, it would mean that one-half of 1 per cent of the entire volume of mail in New York City was advanced by the use of the tubes. It is estimated by the engineers that it would cost from $850,000 to $1,000,000 per annum, approximately one-half of the entire cost for automobile service, to give the proposed tube service. The majority would therefore spend one-half as much to expedite one-half of 1 per cent of the entire volume of mail as is now spent for transporting the other 99½ per cent. The facts before the commission do not warrant the statement that half a million letters would be advanced daily, as this statement is based on theoretical conclusions and is arrived at by assuming that the amount of mail dispatched the next 30 minutes after the present closing would be expedited. This is only conjecture and would not work out in actual practice.

It has been estimated that there will be a saving of $200,000 in automobile service by the use of tubes, but to save this amount it will be necessary to reduce the frequency of the service from half-hour to hourly basis, which would greatly delay other classes of mail. If it is proposed to so delay mails, the frequency of these trips can be reduced without the establishment of pneumatic-tube service as an excuse to do it.

The majority states that for each letter delayed by tubes 3,900 letters are delayed by motor-vehicle service. To arrive at this conclusion there must be placed upon the auto service the responsibility of delays to trains, ferries, and other causes beyond its control. The letters delayed by the late arrival of trains and ferries were delayed just as much when handled by pneumatic tubes. The majority also states that tube service is not subject to the same interference as auto service, which is, no doubt, true; but, on the other hand, it is subject to even a more serious disturbance, which does not affect the auto service at all, such as cave-ins in the streets, construction work, and other causes. When a tube line fails in service the entire service is then out of commission.

Tubes may have had some value when first installed, but, owing to the great increase of the volume of mail, which naturally increased the frequency of the surface transportation, they have lost their original value. It is still true that they would expedite a small volume of mail, but their value as a postal facility is only equal to the expenditure justified by their use, which would be to measure in dollars and cents and benefits accruing from the advancement of mail, and which would be insignificant when compared to their enormous cost.

All the testimony before the commission is based solely on theory. First, it is claimed that half a million letters would be advanced daily by the use of the tubes; but this is based on the theoretical conclusion that all letters accumulating during the next 30 minutes after each closing would be advanced. Any person with an intimate knowledge of the Postal Service knows this can not be true. It is claimed $200,000 can be saved in autotruck service by the use of the tubes. To do so it is admitted that a large number of trips between stations must be discontinued and all other classes of mail delayed. Is it the purpose of the Post Office Department to deliberately delay all other classes of mail in New York in order to use the pneumatic tubes? The public would not and should not be compelled to submit to such delay of their mail, and there would not be a single auto trip omitted or a dollar saved.

The best evidence as to whether the tubes performed efficient service can only be gleaned from what they actually did while in service. When they were used it was necessary to revert to wagons frequently to dispatch the mails. E. M. Morgan, who served as postmaster under the last Republican administration and has again been appointed to that position, says in letters addressed to the postmaster:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
New York, N. Y., January 8, 1917.

Mr. E. M. NORRIS,
Superintendent Railway Mail Service,
Second Division, New York, N. Y.

SIR: Assistant Superintendent of Delivery Jacob Abeles was assigned to observe if there was any congestion of the pneumatic tubes at station O on the evening of January 5, 1917. He reported that between the hours of 7.20 and 8.05 p. m. there were on an average of from 12 to 14 tube carriers ready for dispatch to Grand Central and Pennsylvania Terminal Stations which were delayed about 18 minutes each, due to the fact of the constant arrival of tube carriers from the general post office and stations V, A, and C, which had to be relayed to the Grand Central and Pennsylvania Terminal Stations. At 8.05 p. m. there was only one tube carrier left on the floor ready for dispatch, and there was no further congestion.

Assistant Superintendent of Delivery T. W. Collins was assigned to station D, and he reports that there was no congestion of the pneumatic tubes between 5.30 and 8 p. m. on January 5, 1917.

Very respectfully,

E. M. MORGAN, Postmaster.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
New York, N. Y., January 11, 1917.

Mr. E. M. NORRIS,
Superintendent Railway Mail Service,
Second Division, New York, N. Y.

SIR: Assistant Superintendent of Delivery Jacob Abeles was assigned to observe if there was any congestion of the pneumatic tubes at Madison Square station on the evening of January 8, 1917. He reported that there was no congestion up to 7 p. m. At 7.05 p. m. there were 16 tube carriers containing mail on the floor ready for dispatch, and the last of these carriers was dispatched at 7.21 p. m., a delay of 16 minutes. At 7.32 p. m. there were 14 tube carriers on the floor, and the last one was dispatched at 7.44 p. m., a delay of 12 minutes. At 7.50 p. m. all tube carriers had been dispatched, and there was no more congestion.

Assistant Superintendent of Delivery T. W. Collins was assigned to Times Square Station and reports that there was no congestion of the pneumatic tubes between 5.30 and 8.30 p. m. on January 8, 1917.

Very respectfully,

E. M. MORGAN, Postmaster.

Post Office inspectors observed the operation of the tubes in New York on January 26, 1917, between the hours of 6.45 and 11 p. m. These observations were made of actual operation with full knowledge of the Post Office and pneumatic tube officials. It is natural to presume the tubes were being worked to their fullest capacity and utmost advantage. They reported as regards their observation as follows:

GRAND CENTRAL TERMINAL.

Inspectors Miller and Sharp report as follows: Eleven containers filled at this station at 8.30 p. m., 12 at 8.40 p. m., and 15 at 8.50 p. m., containing mails for train connection via Pennsylvania Terminal were delayed, the last containers being forwarded at 8.35 p. m., 8.45 p. m., and 8.56 p. m., respectively.

Three transit containers arriving between 7.12 and 7.19 p. m. were delayed 7 minutes, and three arriving at 8.40 p. m. were delayed 3 minutes.

MADISON SQUARE STATION.

Inspectors Mundell and McKew report as follows: The northbound tube line was more or less congested between the hours of 6.53 p. m. and 9.39 p. m., the greatest congestion occurring from 7.27 p. m. when 39 containers were on the floor until 9.29 when there were 19 containers awaiting dispatch. The average number of containers awaiting dispatch for each two-minute period during this interval was 36.

One of the containers which was ready at 7.09 p. m. was not dispatched until 7.44 p. m., resulting in a delay of 35 minutes, and another which was ready at 8.37 p. m. was not dispatched until 9.27 p. m., a delay of 50 minutes.

At 8.05 p. m. a tie out of approximately 20 containers for Grand Central Terminal was dispatched in an extra wagon, and at 8.18 p. m. another tie out of about the same quantity of mail was dispatched to Pennsylvania Terminal in an extra wagon. This was close-connection mail for outgoing trains, and an endeavor to dispatch it through the congested tubes at this hour would have caused excessive delay and failure to make train connection. (It is the custom at this and several other stations to revert to the use of wagons when train connections are jeopardized by reason of congestion in the tubes.)

TIMES SQUARE STATION.

Inspectors Neil and Kenyon report as follows: Eighteen containers waited dispatch at 7 p. m., 15 at 7.10 p. m., and 12 at 7.20 p. m. The last containers of each consignment were dispatched at 7.08 p. m., 7.16 p. m., and 7.38 p. m.

PENNSYLVANIA TERMINAL.

Inspectors Larabee and Lamiell report as follows: On several occasions, between 7.05 p. m. and 9 p. m., from 6 to 15 containers were on hand, and at 8.57 p. m. 27 were on hand, the last container of this consignment being dispatched eight minutes late. One container was dispatched three minutes late at 7 p. m., three five minutes late at 7.45 p. m., and three five minutes late at 8.30 p. m.

STATION P.

Inspector Clarahan reports that the first container in a consignment of 15, which were ready for dispatch at 5.45 p. m., was forwarded at 7.05 p. m. and the last at 7.24 p. m. He also reports that 19 containers were ready at 7.25 p. m., the first of which was dispatched at 7.41 p. m. and the last at 7.51 p. m.

STATION O.

Inspector Spillman reports as follows: Between 8.23 and 8.30 p. m. 2 containers were delayed an average of five minutes. From 6.45 to 6.55 p. m. 6 containers were delayed 10 minutes. From 7.03 to 7.15 p. m. 2 containers were delayed 12 minutes, and 1 container was delayed from 7.15 to 7.45 p. m., 10 containers were delayed 15 minutes, from 7.30 to 7.45. From 7.45 to 8 p. m. 6 containers were delayed 15 minutes. From 8 to 8.10 p. m. 4 containers were dispatched which had been delayed 15 minutes. One container was delayed from 7.45 to 8.10 p. m., 25 minutes. From 8.10 to 8.20 p. m. 2 containers were delayed 10 minutes. From 8.20 to 8.35 p. m. 11 containers were delayed 15 minutes. From 8.35 to 8.50 p. m. 2 containers were delayed 15 minutes, and 11 were dispatched which had been delayed 30 minutes. At 7.45 p. m. to 9 p. m. 1 container was dispatched which had been delayed 15 minutes and another which had been delayed 45 minutes.

HUDSON TERMINAL STATION.

Inspector Martin reports that containers which had been awaiting dispatch were delayed as follows: At 7.34 p. m. several containers were delayed from 1 to 3 minutes; at 7.51 p. m. 20 containers were delayed from 1 to 17 minutes; at 7.54 p. m. 9 containers were delayed from 1 to 3 minutes; at 8.02 p. m. 7 containers were delayed from 1 to 8 minutes; at 8.11 p. m. 4 containers were delayed from 1 to 7 minutes; at 8.14 p. m. 7 containers were delayed from 1 to 3 minutes; at 8.23 p. m. several containers were delayed from 1 to 7 minutes; at 8.25 p. m. several containers were delayed from 1 to 3 minutes; at 8.31 p. m. several containers were delayed from 1 to 8 minutes; at 8.44 p. m. 6 containers were delayed from 1 to 4 minutes; at 9.16 p. m. several containers were delayed from 1 to 12 minutes; at 9.54 p. m. 9 containers were delayed from 1 to 7 minutes; at 10 p. m. 10 containers were delayed from 1 to 6 minutes.

GENERAL POST OFFICE.

Inspectors Enteman, Opdyke, Hughes, and Keyes report as follows: At this station 319 containers were delayed from 1 to 20 minutes, but the delays occurred with such frequency that it was not found possible to record the details as to the time and number of containers involved in each dispatch.

The tube lines were in perfect running order and the employees of the tube company were fully aware of the fact that the delays were being recorded by inspectors, and the employees made every endeavor to expedite the dispatches.

In this connection attention is invited to the fact that, since a somewhat similar record was made by the New York office about two months ago, additional motor-wagon trips have been added to route 407012, between stations D, O, Madison Square, and Penn Terminal, in order to relieve the congestion in the tubes and to assure train connections.

F. H. GALBRAITH,
Superintendent of Mails.

These delays to letter mail would not in the ordinary course of business be reported, and accounts for the small number of letters reported by the engineers of the commission as being delayed. Some of the other delays to mail when the tubes were in actual use in New York are as follows:

(Minority report.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.

September 5, 1917: Northward line of pneumatic-tube service between general post office and Madison Square Station suspended operation from 8.40 p. m. to 9.50 p. m. Owing to this suspension the dispatch of approximately 6,000 pieces of mail was delayed.

October 30, 1917: As a result of the foregoing suspensions of service, the dispatch of approximately 25,000 pieces of mail was delayed from two to eight hours.

October 20, 1917: Northward line of tube service between Madison Square Station and Grand Central Station suspended operation from 1.07 p. m. and 3 p. m., delaying the dispatch of approximately 20,000 pieces of mail from three to eight hours.

February 3, 1917: The southward line of tube service between Times Square and Pennsylvania Terminal Station and Station O was interrupted from 4.10 a. m. to 11.08 a. m., mail intended for dispatch over the west side circuit was diverted and received at the main office over the east side circuit, resulting in delaying approximately two hours 400 letters addressed to Philadelphia.

The service between the general post office and the Hudson Terminal Station and between Hudson Terminal Station and the general post office was suspended from 4 p. m. and from 4.30 to 4.37 p. m., so that approximately 2,500 letters were delayed in dispatch from one-half to two hours.

May 18, 19, 1917: Tube service between stations Madison Square, D, and the general post office suspended from 9.35 p. m. (closing time) on May 18, and from 4 a. m. to 11 a. m. May 19. Approximately 2,100 letters delayed in transit on account of suspension of service from 8 to 20 hours, were turned over to the post office after being taken from the line by representative of tube company.

July 30, 1917: Northward line of tube service between Madison Square and Grand Central Station suspended operations 9.18 p. m. to 9.30 p. m., thereby delaying the dispatch of approximately 1,800 letters from two to five hours. The southward line of tube service between Station F, Grand Central, and Madison Square Station ceased operation from 10.05 p. m. until closing time, 11 p. m.

Mr. Morgan, postmaster of New York, who seems to favor the reestablishment of the pneumatic-tube service, has evidently changed his opinion from that of former years. He served as chairman of a committee appointed by former Postmaster General Hitchcock to study the transportation of mails in New York City, which committee, in their report on February 1, 1913, reached the following conclusion:

BRIEFS AND DATA.

"It is easily determinable that the most serious problem with which the postal authorities in New York City will be confronted as soon as the new building on Eighth Avenue is occupied is the moving of mails from the district of the present down-town general post office to the new building for dispatch over the Pennsylvania Railroad. According to present plans, the mails which are now worked in the main down-town office and at the Hudson Terminal Station will be worked in the new down-town building, and it is apparent that a condition will soon be reached when a tube of large dimensions or other system of rapid transportation will be essential between the down-town and uptown offices.

"It is recommended, therefore, that steps be taken looking to the establishment of a service by tunnel or tube operating carriers of not less than 24 inches in diameter between the central down-town post office, the new post-office building on Eighth Avenue, and the Grand Central postal station."

If the 8-inch tube was inadequate in 1913 to transport the mails in New York City, it is certainly useless at this time. The conclusions reached by the committee of post-office inspectors who made a thorough investigation of the pneumatic-tube service in New York City as set forth in their report of March 31, 1917, are as follows:

BRIEFS AND DATA.

In our efforts to offer the best solution of the transportation problem we are forced to the conclusion that the pneumatic-tube service should be abandoned entirely and that a complete and efficient motor-driven vehicular service should be inaugurated. It is recommended such action be taken, and that the advertisements as related to routes Nos. 407012 and 407013 be amended to provide for the employment of additional lightweight cars.

It is the judgment of the ablest men in the Postal Service that the pneumatic tube as was used is obsolete and practically useless as a factor in the transportation of mail. This view was also early expressed by a congressional committee which investigated the Postal Service, and in a report dated January 14, 1901, reported as follows regarding the tubes:

SENATE HEARINGS.

"While we believe that all reasonable means should be utilized to insure the most rapid transmission and delivery of mails possible, we do not believe that pneumatic-tube service in its present stage of development is sufficiently expeditious to warrant the enormous outlay of public money that must be called for if this service were generally extended. We might enter the field of discussion and suggest that if a tube could be constructed and operated which would transmit a full pouch of mail from post office to railroad station or railroad station to post office for a reasonable amount of money, or that a smaller and less expensive tube might be used for city service for the transmission of letters from post-office station to post-office station which should bear an additional charge to reimburse the Government, that it might be for the best interests of the service and the people to continue an appropriation for that purpose.

"But we prefer to confine ourselves to present conditions and the conclusions that we have reached from our examinations and the testimony before us.

"We therefore recommend that under existing conditions the pneumatic-tube service be discontinued."

To reestablish the pneumatic-tube service in New York in the face of these facts would be a step backward in efficient postal service, an extravagant waste of public funds, and a useless expenditure at the time when the public is already overburdened with taxation without benefit to the Postal Service.

A. B. ROUSE.
KENNETH MCKELLAR.

My views on this subject can be stated very briefly. There is only one question here for the consideration of the Congress, to wit, Is the amount of money necessary to have pneumatic-tube postal service in New York City warranted by reason of increased efficiency and expedition in the handling of the mail?

It can not be denied but that a limited percentage of the mail can be expedited by the use of pneumatic tubes, but I am not satisfied that those upon whom rests the burden of proving that the great expenditure necessary to give pneumatic-tube service to the postal service of New York have made out a case. In other words, I am not satisfied that the expedition of the mails is sufficient and the benefits to the service enlarged to such an extent as to justify the expenditure of over half a million dollars annually for this service in New York City alone.

Even if pneumatic-tube service is to be reestablished, I am firmly convinced that it should be done only through Government ownership of the tubes and Government operation of them. No sound reason has been advanced for adding this adjunct to our Postal Service (if it is as valuable as is claimed by its proponents) through a policy of permitting the tubes to be owned by a private corporation and leased by the Government.

Unquestionably in time it will be necessary to have some underground postal transportation system in New York City, but when that time comes the system set up must be capable of transporting all classes of mail with celerity and reasonable cost and owned and operated by the Government.

In view of the foregoing decision I can not support an appropriation for this service in the annual Post Office Department appropriation bill.

DAVID I. WALSH.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY TO HAITI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, the resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] relative to the appointment of Brig. Gen. John H. Russell as high commissioner to Haiti.

Mr. KING. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 249) submitted by Mr. KING yesterday, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has designated Brig. Gen. John H. Russell as high commissioner to Haiti, with the rank of ambassador extraordinary to the Government of that country, without having sent the nomination of said Brig. Gen. John H. Russell to the Senate for the advice and consent of the Senate with respect to his appointment to said office: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby requested to investigate the question as to the power of the President under the Constitution to appoint an ambassador extraordinary to Haiti, without the advice and consent of the Senate in that behalf, and report their findings and opinion to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is an error in the resolution to which I wish to call attention. The President, in reply to the inquiry of the Senate, sent the orders given by him to Gen. Russell and stated that he was sending him as commissioner, with the rank of ambassador, as his agent. Of course, he is an officer of the Army, and the President is sending him there with that rank. But I think in the absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who have special charge of matters relating to Haiti, it would be better if the Senator would allow the resolution to go over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah in considering the question whether he considered also that Lillian Russell was sent over to Europe to settle the immigration question under similar circumstances?

Mr. KING. I might say that this administration seems to have a penchant for the name "Russell," and there may be other Russells clothed with extraordinary powers and sent with roving commissions throughout the world. I can not answer the Senator from Mississippi any more in detail than that.

Mr. President, there ought to be no objection whatever to the adoption of the resolution. I do not wish, however, to seem to take advantage of the absence of any Senator who may be interested in the resolution, and if the Senator from Massachusetts so requests, out of deference to his request I will let the resolution lie on the table, to be called up when I can get the floor during the day.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator. Of course, this appointment is one of the kind which all Presidents have made; it is not an office in any sense of the word; but I am not going to argue the question, because I think it is one that should, with reasonable deference to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois, remain unacted upon until they can be present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will, without prejudice to its further consideration, ask that the resolution go over, and I now give notice that I shall again call it up.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution lie upon the table, and the Senator from Utah may call it up at any time.

Mr. KING. I shall call the matter up to-morrow morning, if I can get the floor for the purpose during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over until to-morrow without prejudice.

ATTORNEYS EMPLOYED BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk and move its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 253), as follows:

Whereas the Senate on January 5, 1922, passed a certain resolution requiring the Alien Property Custodian to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian, together with certain other information specified in said resolution; and

Whereas the Alien Property Custodian has failed and neglected to respond to said resolution, although ample time has intervened since the passing of the same for him to report to the Senate the information requested: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian be, and he is hereby, directed to forthwith report to the Senate the information requested of him in said resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no particular objection to the resolution unless some other Senator may desire to have it go over. I merely wish to state in this connection that, quite by accident, I happened to discuss with one of the officials in the office of the Alien Property Custodian some of the work being done by that office, and he mentioned to me the terrific task which had been imposed upon the office in its effort to reply to the resolution originally introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator, if I may interrupt him——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no right to speak for the official to whom I have referred, and I can not recollect the figures which he gave me, but I gathered the impression that, in order to furnish the information required, a large number of clerks had to be employed in the production of a very bulky document on which they were hard at work.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator from New York that if the Alien Property Custodian had complied with the law, and had filed, as should have been done, on the 1st of January, a full and detailed report of all his proceedings, this resolution would not be necessary. If he has the data on hand which he should have, as by law required, it would be a very easy task to assemble the information called for by the resolution which was adopted by the Senate some time ago.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KING. I suppose under the rule I can do nothing but submit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

UNEMPLOYMENT OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, some days ago I called attention to a statement which had been made that there were 200,000 unemployed in the city of New York, 75,000 of whom were ex-service men. I ask that the Secretary may read a statement which I send to the desk from the head of the American Legion showing that there are 700,000 ex-service men unemployed, and that he is asking the President of the United States to set aside a day in order to help remedy the situation. We are allowing between 300,000 and 400,000 immigrants each year to come into this country when at the same time several million of our own citizens, including hundreds of thousands of ex-service men, are unemployed. I have heretofore urged that all immigration be stopped for five years, and I shall continue my efforts to accomplish this.

I have also offered an amendment, now pending before the Senate Immigration Committee, which would require all aliens to come to the United States in American ships.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the statement presented by the Senator from Georgia?

There being no objection, the statement was read, as follows:

LEGION TO CAMPAIGN TO FIND JOBS FOR 700,000—MACNIDER ASSERTS CONCERTED EFFORT WOULD FIND EMPLOYMENT FOR 500,000.

[By the Associated Press.]

CHICAGO, March 4.

A campaign by the American Legion to obtain employment for 700,000 veterans of the World War now idle and in need has been under consideration by the legion, Col. Hanford MacNider, national commander, announced to-night in an address at a dinner given in his honor by the Illinois department.

National business, civic, fraternal, and welfare organizations have been asked to cooperate and a survey of conditions in each locality will be completed before March 20, which will be known as American Legion employment day, he said.

"Properly supported, this concerted, localized national effort will result in the relief of 500,000 men in 30 days," Col. MacNider asserted. President Harding has been requested to set aside the day by proclamation to obtain relief for unemployed veterans, and governors, mayors of cities, and local leaders have been asked to cooperate, it was announced.

"Resplendent dignitaries, great addresses, and solemn music paid homage to the unknown soldier last November," Col. MacNider said. "This unknown soldier even now is passing your door. Your faith and appreciation will inspire him. Give him work."

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of executive business in open session in order that the four-power treaty may be considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. LODGE. I now make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of a death in his family.

I also wish to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in connection with the work of the Committee on Finance: The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, when we consider the circumstances under which the conference of Washington was called, the condition of the world after the Great War, the burden of taxation under which the peoples of the belligerent nations are suffering, and what has been accomplished under the leadership of the United States, the Senate ought to ratify these treaties without the slightest hesitation. They were acclaimed by the people of all nations, and approved by the most enlightened sentiment of the world.

In June, 1921, the President announced his intention to call a conference in Washington for the purpose of the limitation of naval and land armament. So strong was the sentiment in the Congress for such a movement that on July 12, 1921, there was passed and approved an amendment to the naval appropriation bill authorizing and requesting the President to invite the Governments of Great Britain and Japan to send representatives to a conference—which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or an agreement by which the naval expenditures and building programs of each of said Governments shall be substantially reduced.

On August 11, 1921, the President issued his formal invitation for a conference to meet in Washington on November 11, 1921, for the limitation of armament and the settlement of the Pacific and Far Eastern questions. This conference therefore was called pursuant to a mandate adopted by substantially a unanimous vote of the Congress of the United States, and backed by the enthusiastic approval of the people of this country. The United States is probably the only country which could have taken the lead in this great movement with any hope of success. The war had left Europe torn by factions, inspired by rivalries, jealousies, and racial hatreds, which the treaty of Versailles had not allayed. This Government had held aloof from these disputes, though deeply interested in the peace of the world, for past experience had taught us that any great world conflagration involved the peace and security of this Nation.

The conference met in Washington on the anniversary of the armistice ending the Great War. I believe that few people expected such great accomplishment in so short a time. Various attempts had been made in the past without success. The competition in building navies and raising and equipping land forces had continued uninterruptedly until the war burst with all its fury upon Europe in 1914. Even when the leading statesmen of Europe were, in 1918 and 1919, discussing a proposed league or concert of nations, little if any hope was expressed that a limitation of armament could be agreed upon. This was particularly true of the discussions in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, I believe, in 1918. But the peoples of the belligerent nations—yes, of all nations—were weary of war. They had passed through four years of ruin, devastation, and suffering unparalleled in history, leaving them burdened with debt and oppressed with taxation. They were determined to end the competition between nations in building armaments, the inevitable result of which must be another war.

With the vision of a statesman, realizing his responsibility as Executive head of a great Nation, the President decided to make a determined effort toward an understanding for the limitation of armament, which, confessedly, he knew must include the leading maritime nations of the world. In order to accomplish it the President realized, as I think all statesmen did, that to obtain an agreement for limitation of armament there must be a settlement of the disputes in the Far East and the Pacific which would remove the cause of war. The treaty of Versailles had not adjusted these questions. If anything, the disagreements between Japan and China over the 21 points, the possession of Shantung, and the open door had been aggravated rather than allayed. Japan had been given a mandate over the German islands north of the Equator. This country had not recognized that mandate, and insisted upon the right of constructing and maintaining a cable station upon one of those islands. Japan was proceeding to fortify its outlying islands and carrying on a large program of naval construction. England and the United States were also carrying on programs of naval construction. The burdens of naval armament were to increase instead of decrease. The next war was predicted in the East, and many thought it would come in the near future.

Under these conditions the conference met in Washington. The distinguished statesmen representing the various Governments were inspired with the highest motives and a determination to accomplish something substantial, and they have submitted their labors to the candid judgment of the world. The result of that conference was the following treaties:

(1) The four-power treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, wherein they agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific and agree to confer together to settle any disputes which may thereafter arise. This treaty canceled the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

(2) The treaty between the five powers for the limitation of naval armament and the limitation upon building fortifications on the Pacific islands.

(3) A treaty by the same powers limiting the use of submarines and noxious gases in warfare.

(4) A treaty between the nine powers relating to the principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China, and to provide for an open door and equality of opportunity of trade and commerce.

(5) A treaty between the nine powers relating to the Chinese customs tariff.

(6) A treaty and an understanding recorded in the minutes between Japan and China adjusting and settling the disputes between those two countries, especially restoring to China the German territory and rights in Shantung which had been taken by Japan, including the railway.

I shall not at this time attempt to discuss in detail these various treaties, but in passing it seems to me important to emphasize those in relation to China. The limitation of armament treaty is well understood by everyone. It will be discussed in the Senate, undoubtedly, at great length. It is the first great constructive effort in the world in all the long centuries of war to limit the construction of naval armament, which, if it were to go on, undoubtedly would produce another conflict, and meanwhile burden the peoples of this country and of the world. I shall not, therefore, stop to discuss that treaty, because it was the object of this conference. All the other treaties are auxiliary to it and in aid of it, in order that this object might be attained.

The nine-power treaty between the powers and China in relation to the open door of China, I think, deserves brief consideration. The treaty between these nine powers relating to the principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China is of very great importance to this country. It contains stipulations for the open door, which have been advocated by this country from the time John Hay was Secretary of State; and the nine powers having established in the principles of the sovereignty and independence of China the open door and equal opportunity for trade and commerce, I believe that they will be adopted by all the other nations of the world.

So far as this country is concerned, it carries out a cherished policy, and I believe is of very great importance in settling the difficult problems in the Far East.

By article 1 of this treaty the contracting powers agree to respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China; to provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government; to use their influence for establishing and maintaining equal opportunity for commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China; and to refrain from making any agreements for special rights or privileges.

By article 2 the powers agree not to make any treaty infringing upon the principles laid down in article 1, and in article 3 they agree that they will not support their nationals in obtaining any superior rights to commercial and economic development, or any monopoly of trade and industry in China.

By article 4 the contracting powers agree not to support any agreement by their respective nationals with each other designed to create spheres of influence or to provide for the enjoyment of mutually exclusive opportunities in designated parts of Chinese territory.

Article 5 provides that there shall be no discrimination upon the Chinese railways in respect of charges or of facilities for shipment between the nationals of different countries.

Mr. President, I listened yesterday to a resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] requesting information from the President as to whether the Lansing-Ishii agreement was now in force, and a like question was addressed to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], both of whom said that it was not in force.

Just for a moment let us see what the Lansing-Ishii agreement was. The question was undoubtedly asked with a view to raising the question of whether there was not now in existence an understanding between the State Department and Japan, whereby the latter retained special interests in China, which has not been abrogated by this nine-power treaty.

The Lansing-Ishii agreement, to commence with, is not a treaty. It was merely an exchange of notes between Mr. Lansing and Viscount Ishii, the special representative of Japan. I shall not read these notes, but two or three clauses will illustrate the point I am making.

In the note of November 2, 1917, to the ambassador extraordinary of Japan, Viscount Ishii, Mr. Lansing said:

> The Governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and consequently the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which their possessions are contiguous.
> The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired, and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that while geographical position gives Japan such special interests they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other powers.
> The Governments of the United States and Japan deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China, and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principles of the so-called "open door" or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Mr. President, to commence with, those special interests were defined by the representative of Japan at the last conference as not conferring any sphere of influence or special interest other than that which would arise from the nearness of the Chinese territory to Japan, and Japan's necessary interest in the trade and commerce of China which were open to all countries.

Baron Shidehara, in the declaration he made in the conference, made clear what is meant by Japan when referring to special interests in China. As thus defined, these special interests are not claimed to connote either political domination or exclusive privileges, or any claim or pretension prejudicial to China or any other foreign nation, or any antagonism to the principles of the open door and equal opportunity. He said:

> To say that Japan has special interests in China is simply to state a plain and actual fact. It intimates no claim or pretension of any kind prejudicial to China or to any other foreign nation.
> Nor are we actuated by any intention of securing preferential or exclusive economic rights in China. Why should we need them? Why should we be afraid of foreign competition in the Chinese market, provided it is conducted squarely and honestly? Favored by geographical position, and having fair knowledge of the actual requirements of the Chinese people, our traders and business men can well take care of themselves in their commercial, industrial, and financial activities in China without any preference or exclusive rights.
> We do not seek any territory in China, but we do seek a field of economic activity beneficial as much to China as to Japan, based always on the principle of the open door and equal opportunity.

Then, he goes on to explain that the special interests arise simply from propinquity, and by reason of the fact that Japan has a large trade and commerce, and is dependent a great deal upon China for her raw materials, and so forth.

That this note was in the minds of the representatives of this Government and of the other Governments is perfectly evident from the discussion by Mr. Balfour on the 8th day of December, in the fourteenth meeting of the conference, reported on page 563 of the proceedings of the conference. He said:

> It might, of course, be said that China, not being a party to such treaties, need in no way recognize them nor consider herself bound by any of their provisions. That was legally true. But the political effect produced by a group of such treaties, just as in the case of spheres of influence, tended so to modify the political and economic situation in China that no efforts on the part of the Chinese Government would succeed in preserving its liberty of action. Should recognition be given to the practice that China need not be consulted, the total results of a group of such cases must be examined. In that case it was claimed that vital interests of China would be affected, and that the nature of activities and interests within China would be determined entirely by the action of outside powers. The Chinese Government would then find itself obliged to move along grooves laid down by others without having once had an opportunity of insisting upon her own life needs as seen by herself.
> It must therefore be concluded that though an individual agreement might, on the face of it, concern only the action of outside powers, if that action related to China, the Chinese Government could not remain indifferent to it because of the effect which the continued practice of making agreements of this kind would have upon the liberty of movement and the development of the Chinese Government and the nation itself.

This had been preceded, as the Senator from Massachusetts well remembers, by a statement of Mr. Koo substantially to the same effect. It shows, therefore, that the representatives of this Government had in mind exactly such a situation as would arise from any possible claim by the Japanese Government that this Lansing-Ishii note granted to her any special rights, like a sphere of influence or an exclusive right to trade within China.

When, therefore, we find a disclaimer by Japan, a statement in the open conference, of the class of treaties and notes and agreements and understandings between powers other than China which were intended to be covered by this treaty, and when we read the fourth provision of article 1, whereby the Governments agree to refrain from taking any advantage of conditions in China, or to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly States, and from countenancing any action inimical to the security of separate States, we can see that there is not anything left whatever that may have existed in the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

In any event, it seems by the declaration of Japan that all she claimed from that instrument was a superior right by reason of her contiguity to the Chinese territory. We were seven or eight thousand miles away. While we had trade in China, Japan was near China. Her interest, therefore, was greater and more vital to her national life than ours, although they were not special privileges which were not in the reach of any other country, and if they were they were rendered absolutely void by this treaty.

We all remember the discussion which took place in the Senate when the question of Shantung was before the Senate. I am not going to stir up the embers of the old Versailles treaty debate, but I believe that there was no question which interested the American people more than the provision of that treaty which gave the German leased territories in Shantung to Japan. There was a treaty made at this conference between Japan and China—although, to be sure, this country was not a party to it—undoubtedly induced by the good offices of representatives of this Government as well as those of other Governments. In one moment I shall mention the nature of this treaty.

This was a treaty, and also a resolution, which may be taken as a part of the whole document executed by the Japanese and Chinese representatives. This treaty is entirely a treaty for the settlement of outstanding questions relative to Shantung. It provides for an adjustment of nearly all the questions between those countries which were left unsettled by the treaty of Versailles and which resulted in the failure of China to sign that treaty. Japan agrees to transfer to China the former German leased territory of Kiachow, with all public property therein, and the Japanese troops are to be withdrawn from China. The customhouses are to be turned over to China. Japan also agrees to transfer the Tsing-Tao Railway and its branches, with all properties appertaining thereto, and China agreed to pay Japan 53,406,141 gold marks, being the assessed value of the railroads in the hands of the Germans, and to pay Japan for all permanent improvements made since that time. This sum to be secured upon the revenues of the railway for a period of 15 years and to be payable at the option of China at any time after 5 years. All mines for which rights were formerly granted to Germany are to be turned over to a Chinese corporation, in which the capital of the two countries may be equally represented. Japan agrees that it will not seek any establishment of exclusive Japanese settlement or international settlement in the former German leased territory and China agrees that the same will be open for foreign trade and foreign nations will be permitted to freely reside and carry on commerce, industry, and other lawful pursuits within such area. The salt industry is to be transferred to China, and China agrees that exportation of salt to Japan shall be permitted on reasonable terms. The former German cables are to be transferred to China, with the exception of two cables which have been utilized by the Japanese Government. All wireless stations to be transferred to China for a fair compensation. These are the principal features of this most important treaty.

Mr. President, I think it was not one of the least of the accomplishments of the American delegates and the other delegates to this conference to bring about an adjustment and settlement of the questions in China and the maintenance of the open door, for which this country has struggled for many, many years.

It is not, however, my intention at this time to go into any detailed discussion of those various treaties. It is sufficient to say that, as a whole, they were made necessary in order that we might enter into an agreement with the naval powers for limitation of armament. Everyone knows that without these treaties we could not have brought Japan into an agreement—and Japan was a great naval power—which would have been accepted by her for the limitation of the building of armament.

This was evident to the President—to everybody attending the conference—and it must have been evident to the Congress when it passed the resolution calling for a limitation of naval armament, that it could never be accomplished without an adjustment of these differences and disputes in the Far East. There is no way of settling disputes between nations except by treaties, as there is no way to obtain a limitation of armament but in the same way, and it seems to me that Senators will take a heavy responsibility in attempting to defeat any one of these treaties so necessary to the accomplishment of the great object of this conference. The treaties may not in detail meet the ideas of every Senator, but we must remember that every Senator can not have his own way, and that if they are to be ratified and the work of the conference consummated there must be accommodation of views and a broad-minded attitude in order that this great work may be accomplished.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

I now invite the Senate's attention to the four-power treaty, which seems to be the storm center of opposition. It was the first and one of the most necessary steps in arriving at the limitation of armament, and properly to understand the reasons for making it we must take into consideration the conditions existing in the Far East.

The United States, Japan, France, and England had possessions in the western and southern Pacific, and Japan and the British Empire had obtained mandates over certain of the Pacific islands. There existed a defensive alliance between the British Empire and Japan, known as the Anglo-Japanese alliance, under which it was agreed as follows:

> If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

This was the Anglo-Japanese alliance that stood in the face of this conference when limitation of armament was proposed to the world.

This treaty was viewed by the United States and by other powers with suspicion, and it was thought by the distinguished statesmen representing this country that if we were to find a firm basis of mutual friendship and permament peace there should be no offensive or defensive alliances existing in the East, especially in view of the fact that Japan and the British Empire were two of the great naval powers of the world. It was therefore agreed that upon the ratification of the four-power treaty the agreement made between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded in London on July 13, 1911, known as the Anglo-Japanese alliance, should terminate.

I saw an article this morning in The Outlook which seemed to me to put this question in a very few words:

> A vote—
> Says The Outlook—
> against the treaty is a vote for an alliance—a vote, in fact, for an alliance in which America has no part. A vote for the treaty is a vote not only against this alliance but against all alliances in the Far East. If the treaty is adopted, the Anglo-Japanese alliance is at an end; if it is not adopted, the Anglo-Japanese alliance will continue and will have added significance by the very fact of the rejection of its substitute.
> We can hardly believe that the country wishes the Senate to say virtually to Great Britain and Japan, "We decline to promise to respect your rights; we do not wish in any case of dispute even to confer with you; and we prefer that you should keep up your military partnership."

Very well said.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I would like to ask the Senator a question, not in a controversial spirit, because I expect to vote for the treaty, possibly with a reservation. I would like the Senator's view with respect to this situation.

Great Britain and Japan have both ratified the Versailles treaty. Great Britain and Japan are both parties to the four-power pact. Under the Versailles treaty any controversy which may arise between any two of the signatory powers goes before the assembly or, under certain conditions, before the council of the League of Nations. Under the four-power pact any controversy which is the subject matter of consideration in the four-power pact must be considered by the four powers.

Query: Assume that a controversy arises between Great Britain and Japan relative to some island possession in the Pacific region. Under the terms of the Versailles treaty the assembly might have jurisdiction of it. Under the four-power pact the four signatory powers would have jurisdiction of it. Would that controversy have to be submitted to the two tribunals for consideration, or what would happen in the event that such a controversy as I have indicated should arise?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it would have to be submitted to the League of Nations at all. We are not a party to the League of Nations——

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me complete my answer, please. The league does not prohibit, so far as an outside country is concerned, Great Britain and Japan entering into an agreement with the United States whereby they agree to consult together as to any dispute which may arise between them or between those parties and any outside nations as to this particular subject. I do not think that the League of Nations could have any jurisdiction, because those countries have made, not agreements of arbitration with us, not binding agreements to submit to the decision of any conference or league, but simply an agreement to consult together as to any question in which they may be mutually interested.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator is answering me from the standpoint of the United States. That was not the phase of the problem which was in my mind or which was contemplated by my question. Looking at it from the standpoint of Great Britain and Japan, who are, in the hypothetical case I have submitted, parties to the controversy, should they submit it to the assembly under the treaty of Versailles or should they submit it for consideration to the conference of the four powers under the four-power treaty; and if either the one or the other or both, what would be the result?

Mr. KELLOGG. The four-power treaty is the latest treaty. This is a treaty made simply for conference as to the particular subjects with a country not a member of the League of Nations, and I see no reason whatever why this conference would have to go to the League of Nations. The League of Nations covenant does not provide that nations shall not confer over subjects in which they are mutually interested. That is the best answer I can make.

Now let us see what the four-power treaty provides for. The preamble of this treaty states that it is made with a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of the rights of the respective nations in their insular possessions in the region of the Pacific; and, in order to accomplish this, article 1 of the treaty provides that the high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and dominions in this region. It is true that there is no definition as to just what those rights are, and no definition is necessary. We have absolute dominion over the Philippine Islands, and the other powers agree to respect those rights. The other powers have absolute dominion or mandatories over other islands, and we agree to respect their rights. There is little, if any, chance for disagreement as to what those rights are. But assume that the title of any country should be questioned, we do not agree to submit that question to arbitration or to the decision of any conference or to be bound by any finding, but simply to consult together with a view to the adjustment of any disagreements.

Has it come to this that this country can not agree to respect the rights of other countries in order that there may be a better understanding and a preservation of the peace of the world? Shall we decline to meet in conference or to communicate with other nations with a view to settling international difficulties and maintaining peace? Shall we follow a policy of isolation and competition in building navies and land armaments, a policy which brought on the great European war? In my judgment conferences, communications as to disputes, and intimate associations are the surest means for preservation of peace. If nations can be induced to talk over their disputes and controversies, war is very unlikely. Had Germany consented to a European conference, the Great War would, in all probability, have been prevented.

But it is said that we are entering into an alliance which will involve us in the disputes of the Far East and may bring on a war. An alliance is generally understood to be an agreement between nations whereby if one is attacked the other agrees to go to war in its defense, like the Anglo-Japanese alliance, terminated by this treaty, the triple alliance, the Franco-Russian alliance, or the alliance between the United States and France of 1778. If this four-power treaty constitutes an alliance, then practically all the treaties we have ever made, by which we agree to consult together to arbitrate questions, to lay down rules of action in war or in peace, to limit armament upon the Great Lakes, are alliances. Have any of those treaties ever drawn us into war? Again, are we liable to be drawn into disputes in the Far East by consulting with interested nations more than by holding aloof and taking the position that we will look after our own affairs? The questions and differences are more liable to arise without this treaty than with it; and if differences arise in which we are interested they are much more liable to be adjusted after consultation with other nations than by taking the attitude that we will protect our own rights and they must look out for theirs. The treaty does not create the questions; the questions exist to-day and are bound to exist, whether we ratify the treaty or whether we do not. For nearly three years we held absolutely aloof from the war in Europe, and yet we were drawn into it.

I do not say that had a treaty existed by which the European nations had agreed to consult with each other before war should be declared it would certainly have prevented the conflict, because Germany had built up a great war machine and believed she could dominate Europe. But I do believe that had there been in existence an understanding for the limitation of armament, whereby armament had been kept down to a reasonable basis and an agreement to consult together before resorting to arms, there would have been no war in Europe in 1914. That is exactly what this country is now trying to do by the conference which has just adjourned. In view of the appalling calamity of the World War and the present disordered condition of the world, is it possible that the United States Senate is willing to take any chances whatever of defeating the objects sought to be attained by the leadership of the United States? The results of this conference have been hailed as the hope of the world by the afflicted nations of Europe. As this country led in the conference, it should lead in the consummation of its labors.

But why this sudden opposition to entering into a treaty whereby we agree to consult with other nations in order to prevent misunderstanding and avoid war? We have been making conventions and agreements with other nations for mutual action and understandings for many years, notably the following: Treaties with all the leading nations of the world, entered into by Mr. Bryan as Secretary of State, for arbitration and settlement of disputes. These treaties are substantially in the same form. Article 1 is as follows, and I invite attention to its language:

> The high contracting parties agree that all disputes between them, of every nature whatsoever, which can not be adjusted through diplomatic methods, or are not submitted to arbitration, shall be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission, to be constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding article; and they agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted.

Then article 2 provides for the creation of an international commission. There is much more of an alliance under every one of those treaties than there is under the four-power treaty, whereby we simply agree to consult with the other powers in the event of a dispute arising in the East or in the event of an aggression by any outside power on the rights of any of the signatory nations.

An agreement between Great Britain, Russia, and Japan for the protection of fur seals; a convention between Great Britain and the United States, entered into in 1817, regulating the naval forces upon the Great Lakes; the postal convention; the international wireless and telegraph convention; the international law commission; an agreement for the unification of rules with respect to assistance and salvage at sea; international prize court convention; international naval conference; international sanitary convention; convention relating to patents, designs, and industrial models; and many others too numerous to mention. These agreements require constant cooperation with other countries. Some of them affect territory and rights of citizens, regulate rules of warfare, rights upon the high seas, and questions of armament on the Great Lakes. Why not an agreement between the four leading powers to respect their rights in the Pacific and to consult together with a view of settling any disputes? Is there any more danger of involving us in entangling alliances by reason of this agreement to respect each other's territory than by reason of all the other numerous treaties, agreements, conventions, and arbitration tribunals heretofore made and now in existence with other nations?

Mr. President, it has been said that this treaty constitutes, or at least from it there may be implied, some agreement to defend the possessions of the other parties to it, and in order to satisfy those who are afraid of committing this country to anything of that kind a reservation was adopted by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations reading as follows:

> The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

This, therefore, brings me to a discussion of the particular language of this treaty to ascertain if it implies any agreement to come to the defense of the other parties to it, or any obligation to use force, or, as the Senator from Massachusetts said in presenting the treaty, if any force lurks in the background.

Some, at least, of the members who voted for this reservation did not believe it was necessary, but apparently did so because they thought it could do no harm. I voted against the reservation in the committee, and I desire to state my reasons for doing so, for they involve a construction of the four-power treaty. It has been claimed on the floor of the Senate that there is at least a moral obligation to defend the territory of other countries and to come to their assistance with armed forces, and that in this regard the treaty resembles article 10 of the League of Nations covenant. I submit there is no semblance of similarity. There is no agreement to maintain any nation's rights to territory, no commitment to any force whatever, no obligation, expressed or implied, resembling article 10, except to respect the rights of the other nations. It will be remembered that article 10 of the League of Nations covenant not only undertook to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league but to preserve the same as against external aggression. Here was a direct, individual obligation, and the article further provided that in case of any aggression the council of the league should advise upon the means by which the obligation was to be fulfilled.

I am aware that some Senators believed there was no obligation without the advice of the league, and that we were under no obligation to accept that advice. If that is true, then there is certainly no obligation here. I do not think that was the proper construction, but I know other Senators differ from me. Does anyone believe, in view of the record of the Senate, and the expressed wish of the Nation, that the distinguished statesmen who negotiated this treaty—Messrs. Hughes, Lodge, Underwood, and Root—undertook to bind this country to any defense of other nations' territory? I do not believe the most vivid imagination can conjure up, from the language of this treaty, any obligation of this kind whatever. Let us examine the language.

Under section 1, if there should develop a controversy between the high contracting parties, arising out of any question involving their said rights, which is not settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between these countries, it is agreed that—

> They shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference, to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

There is absolutely no binding agreement for us to do anything else than to meet and discuss any differences in order to avoid the calamities of war. No principle is better settled, by the universal practice of nations, by the principles of international law, by the history of all conferences, than that this simply provides for a conference, subject to all the rules of such conferences. The language is plain and unambiguous. There is no agreement for arbitration, there must be unanimity, and no action can be taken except by the respective Governments through their constitutional authority.

I shall not attempt to go into the authorities on this question, but I desire to refer to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which bears upon it. What I have stated would be true even as between private parties; how much more so between sovereign nations? To show the Senate how different the language in agreements referring matters for consideration and adjustment is from the language used in arbitration agreements, let me cite the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gordon against the United States, reported in Seventh Wallace.

That case involved the construction of an act of Congress referring claims against the Government to the Secretary of War "to examine and adjust their claims on principles of equity and justice, having due regard to the proofs for the value of the property taken or destroyed." "Examine and adjust" is the language of the act of Congress. The language of this treaty is "they shall invite the other high contracting powers to a joint conference, to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment." It was claimed that the act of Congress constituted the Secretary of War an arbitrator, and that the Government was bound by his adjustment. The Supreme Court held to the contrary. The court said:

> It is asserted that this is a case of arbitrament and award, and was binding as such on the Government, and that the repeal of the resolution of Congress could not affect or invalidate the rights vested by the award previously made under it. But the Secretary of War was not an arbitrator. An arbitrator is defined as "a private extraordinary judge chosen by the parties who have a matter in dispute invested with power to decide the same." The Secretary of War acted ministerially. The resolution conferred no judicial power upon him.

Here is the language to which I wish to invite especial attention:

> In order to clothe a person with the authority of an arbitrator the parties must mutually agree to be bound by the decision of the person chosen to determine the matter in controversy.

Now, of course, that is the universal rule as to conferences in international law and as to conferences between private parties. How much more so, as I have said, would it be in the case of sovereign governments?

The same principle applies to section 2 of the treaty. If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly, in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Here, again, there is nothing but an understanding to communicate fully and frankly with each other in order that the threatened aggression may be warded off or adjusted, and the same principle applies—there is no binding agreement, no arbitration; there must be unanimity, and any action is subject to the approval of the home Government, according to its constitutional methods. But it is said that as, under article 2, the powers agree to communicate with each other in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation, the power to act and bind this Government to defensive means is implied. I submit that no power to bind this Government to go to war or to assist in the defense of any territory of another power can possibly be implied from the language here used, especially in view of the constitutional limitations of this Government. Every presumption would be against such implied power.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that by this language this country can be bound to go to war by an implication or in any other way except by the most express language?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly not. The claim that by the language of this treaty this country is bound to go to war in the defense of other territories is one that no lawyer would make for a moment in a court of justice. It could only be made in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think our treaty with Panama is an obligation which compels us to protect that country; and if that protection eventuated in war, then the guaranty of protection would lead us into war.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is in the Panama treaty is entirely lacking here. There is an agreement in the Panama treaty to protect her territory; and while, as the Senator from Washington says, that is what is called a treaty obligation, of course even that could not be carried out without the action of the Congress. There, however, was a treaty obligation. Here it is entirely lacking.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I was not attacking the provision here or differing from the construction which the Senator was placing upon it. I was attempting to answer what I understood to be the position of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], namely, that there could not be a treaty obligation which imposed upon the United States the obligation of going to war. Of course, I agree that notwithstanding the treaty obligation the Senate might refuse to declare war.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Washington did not make any such statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I made no such statement as that just quoted by the Senator from Utah. I do not believe there is any such limitation on the treaty-making power. What I said was that the United States can not be bound to go to war by an implication. There must be an express agreement before such a radical obligation as war is imposed upon a nation. I did not say that a treaty can not be made in express terms to that effect. On the contrary, I said that in all probability it could be made, and the Panama treaty does contain the express obligation on our part to protect that country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, so that it may not be left as though I did any injustice to the Senator, permit me to say that I understood him differently from the statement which he now makes. With the statement which he now makes I have no controversy whatever.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator. I am speaking now from the plain, simple, well-understood language of this instrument. It was so understood by every delegate at the convention, so announced when the treaty was adopted, and this announcement clearly accepted; but it was not necessary to announce this, because the language is so plain that it is not subject to any other construction, and I doubt if any member of the conference ever dreamed that such a construction would be placed upon it until he read the proceedings of the Senate.

It was so understood by the delegates framing the treaty, the understanding expressed at the meeting of the conference when it was adopted, so understood by the President, and I am at a loss to see how it could be understood otherwise.

In reporting the treaty to the joint conference, Senator LODGE stated as follows:

> To put it in a few words, the treaty provides that the four signatory powers will agree as between themselves to respect their insular possessions and dominions in the region of the Pacific, and that if any controversy should arise as to such rights, all the high contracting parties shall be invited to a joint conference looking to the adjustment of such controversy. They agree to take similar action in the case of aggression by any other power upon these insular possessions or dominions. The agreement is to remain in force for 10 years, and after ratification under the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties, the existing agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded in London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate. And that is all. Each signer is bound to respect the rights of the others and before taking action in any controversy to consult with them. There is no provision for the use of force to carry out any of the terms of the agreement and no military or naval sanction lurks anywhere in the background or under cover of these plain and direct clauses.

As said by the American delegates in their report to the President:

> This statement was made in open conference, in the presence of the delegates who signed the treaty, and must be regarded as an authority of accepted exposition of its import.

If anything was necessary, here is a plain statement of what the document means. The President, in his speech to Congress, stated substantially the same thing, but no construction is necessary. There is no doubtful language, no real opportunity for disagreement. No principle is better settled than the one that if a sovereign nation is to be bound by a joint conference, there must be the clearest and most specific language to that effect, and that if a representative of the United States in such conference is to bind his country to any course of action, there must be clear and specific language conferring the power for him to do so. Any such language is lacking in this instrument. It was not lacking in article 10 of the League of Nations covenant; that is, if that covenant had been ratified. While it was admitted in the discussion in the Senate upon the ratification of the Versailles treaty that the council of the league could not bind this country to go to war without the vote of Congress, it could not be denied, I think, that there was a positive agreement to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league, and when the council had advised upon the means of enforcing the obligation, there was a treaty obligation for this country to act. There is no such language here.

Again, it is said some country may claim there is a moral obligation for us to defend its territory in the case of such aggression. In view of the contemporaneous construction placed upon this treaty by the delegates at the open conference when it was adopted, what standing would any country have to claim that any such obligation, moral or legal, existed? On what ground could any country appeal to the judgment of the world in view of this construction? Everyone knows the controlling influence of contemporaneous construction placed upon treaties. But suppose some nation should make the claim? Our position, in the light of these declarations, would strongly appeal to the judgment of the nations of the world. We can certainly not be drawn into a war any more than we would be if we had not attended the conference. We certainly would have the right to rely upon the plain language of the instrument as interpreted by all of the delegates at the time of its adoption.

Mr. President, I listened the other day to a statement by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I think, on mature consideration, he will change his view. He stated that he spoke without much preparation, because he was leaving the Senate; but let me read in that connection the statement that he made about the Versailles treaty in 1919.

On March 2 of this year, when this treaty was before the Senate, the Senator from Nebraska said:

> Mr. President, I have expressed in a somewhat rambling way my criticisms of the treaty. I would be glad to see such reservations and amendments as can, first, make it definite and certain that we are not bound to assist any of the other nations in any way against an aggression from any other country unless it is unprovoked; and, again, that if the President of the United States is to have the power to enter into an agreement with other nations at a conference as to taking efficient action for their protection, his agreement must be subject to the approval of the Congress of the United States, or at least, of the Senate of the United States.

Now let me show the Senate what the Senator from Nebraska said about article 10 of the League of Nations. I was claiming in the Senate that article 10 contained a distinct and separate obligation on the part of each country to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of each other member of the league. The Senator from Nebraska said:

> I am very much surprised that the Senator should insert something into the league which is not there at all. I think there is not a word in the constitution of the league anywhere which justifies any nation in calling upon any other for protection. On the other hand, specific provision is made that the advice must come from the council of nine nations, which must be unanimous, and we constitute one of the nine.

If there was no obligation in article 10 that needed a reservation—and that was the position of the distinguished Senator—how he can conjure up any obligation from this language is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, to show that the phase of this question which the Senator is now discussing is a very practical political question before the country, I want to call his attention to and ask his views about a brief statement published a few days ago in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, one of a series of papers owned by Mr. Hearst, which has taken a very active part throughout the country in the discussion of this question:

> Suppose there should be war between Russia and Japan! Suppose Russia, big but inactive, now a sleeping Goliath, should awake and demand a return of her Siberian territory! Suppose she attacks Japan and her insular possessions by force of arms, as is quite possible, what then?
> Under the terms of the European and Asiatic four-party alliance the United States would be morally and legally bound, at the instance of Japan, to come to her aid—to send the pick of our youth to help preserve the Japanese Empire and all its war grabs.
> Is Senator MILES POINDEXTER, of Washington, in favor of such a course? Is he willing that the blood of our American boys be shed that an Oriental dynasty might flourish and grow more powerful?

I should like to get the views of the Senator from Minnesota as to whether we would be under such a fearful obligation as that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, there is not a word in this document that even implies any such obligation. I know that just such statements as that have been circulated industriously over the country, to give the impression to those who have not studied this treaty that we are entering into an alliance whereby we bind ourselves to go to war in defense of any territory of another country if attacked by a third party, or in the event of any dispute between the four powers. There never was such a propaganda with less foundation. Of course, it was started for effect, and some of it has been industriously encouraged in the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. KING. In the absence of the Senator from Nebraska, may I inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota, in reading from the speech delivered by the Senator from Nebraska and last quoted by him, takes issue with the statements there made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was not of the same opinion as the Senator, as my speech at that time showed. I thought there was a distinct several obligation on each country to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other countries. I know many Senators disagreed with me.

Mr. KING. The Senator understands that the position of the Senator from Nebraska was that whatever obligation there was, it was merged in the action of the council, and when the council took action the obligation, if there was one, would be called into life.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes; but it was also the opinion of the Senator, I think, and many other Senators, that that was merely advice, and that we were morally and legally entitled to use our own judgment as to whether we would follow it or not.

As the Senator calls it to my attention, let me illustrate it by reading a clause from the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] in which he said, as to article 10:

> The unanimous recommendation of the council is only advisory and must be approved by the Governments of the several members of the league. This insures that the burden under this article will be fairly and properly distributed. While each member of the league makes a solemn pledge of mutual protection, yet each reserves its right of judgment as to duty and obligation in each case as it arises and the means by which it shall be discharged. Thus, under article 10, no troops of the United States could be sent to engage in war without the advice of her representatives in the council and the approval of her Congress. This insures us against undue burdens and impositions. It leaves the extent of our moral and political obligations to our own sense of honor, and we ourselves measure the just demands upon our plighted promise.

If it be true as to article 10, how can anyone believe that there is a moral obligation to go to war under this treaty?

Mr. KING. If I may interrupt the Senator, I am inclined to think, speaking for myself, that the Senator's construction was right, and I think that was the view of President Wilson; but may I say to the Senator that that view is not the one which has been more recently taken by the league itself. They have announced that the obligation rested upon the several members of the league to act as they might determine, regardless of the recommendation of the council.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the Senator realizes the difference between that obligation and any conference called under this treaty?

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; I did not mean to institute any comparison.

Mr. KELLOGG. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], a very distinguished lawyer, gave this subject very careful consideration. In a colloquy between him and the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], referring to article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations, he stated as follows:

> The purpose of this clause is obviously to secure concert of action, but it is left to each nation to determine for itself, the recommendation of the council notwithstanding, whether the occasion calls for action in fulfillment of its obligation and how that obligation ought to be discharged.
> Mr. KELLOGG. But I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] claims that not only are the recommendations of the council merely advisory, but as to the extent of our obligation it is for the Congress of the United States to determine the justness of the demand.
> Mr. WALSH. I agree with that.

Again, in a colloquy between the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the following occurred:

> Mr. BORAH. The Senator may look it up later, but let me ask the Senator—I may have misconstrued his speech—what is the Senator's position now? May we disregard at our own discretion the advice of the council?
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly we may.
> Mr. BORAH. May we do so without any discredit and dishonor to ourselves?
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly we may do so without any discredit or dishonor to ourselves. I have called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the language is that the council may advise. We do not undertake to follow the advice. Mr. President, the question as to whether we ought to act in accordance with the advice as a question of policy or wisdom is one thing, but we have not bound ourselves to do so.

As I have said before, this conference was called in Washington by the President, and by the authority of Congress, in response to the overwhelming sentiment of the American people. A number of treaties, adjusting and settling questions in the Pacific and the Far East, have been adopted in order to make possible an agreement for the limitation of naval armament, and while I recognize the perfect right and the duty of the Senate, in the event it believes American rights are jeopardized, to place reservations upon, to amend, or to refuse to ratify a treaty, this should not be done upon unsubstantial grounds and mere vague suspicions and fears. The United States today, I believe, is the greatest moral force in the world, whose strength and leadership made possible the work of this conference.

I hope we will not weaken that leadership or discredit the work of the conference by throwing obstacles in the way of making these treaties by inviting criticism and changes by other countries. It will undoubtedly be said that if my construction of the treaty is correct, the reservation can do no harm. This may be so; but what assurance have we that it is so? There should be stronger ground for the adoption of reservations by the Senate than the argument that they can do no harm. If we are going to ratify the treaty covered over with unnecessary reservations because they can do no harm, we may find that other countries will do the same, and some of the reservations—theirs or ours—may hinder the ratification or weaken the effect of the treaty.

I have tried to present this matter to the Senate candidly, with due regard to the responsibilities of a Senator, and in no dogmatic spirit or in any spirit of criticism of Senators who disagree with me. I realize that the opinion of others is entitled to the same weight as my own, if not greater. All I am trying to do is to aid as much as possible in the ratification of these treaties, and I shall do everything in my power to that end. I do think, however, that the judgment of the distinguished statesmen representing this country, who participated in the conference, should be given great weight in the deliberations of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading cerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKinley	Rawson
Borah	Harreld	McNary	Robinson
Broussard	Harris	Nelson	Sheppard
Calder	Harrison	Newberry	Shields
Cameron	Heflin	Nicholson	Shortridge

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM], on account of a death in his family.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is unavoidably detained and will be all through the day. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent on account of serious illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask if there is any Senator who desires at this time to continue the discussion of the treaty now pending? [After a pause.] There appears to be no Senator present ready to go on. I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to vote if there is no one ready to speak. I have allowed the treaty to go thus far without pressing anyone, but I think the time has come when we at least ought to debate it, if we are going to debate it, and if we are not going to debate it, then the sooner we get a vote the better. I merely give this notice so that there need to be no misunderstanding.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative session.

GOV. REILY OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the senate of Porto Rico, with an accompanying letter of transmittal, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions:

SENADO DE PUERTO RICO,
San Juan, Porto Rico, February 28, 1922.

Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: To give due course to the request contained in the second paragraph of the Senate resolution relative to the Governor of Porto Rico, E. Montgomery Reily, adopted by said body on February 25, I have the honor to inclose herewith a certified copy of said resolution.

Respectfully,

JOSÉ MUÑOZ RIVERA,
Secretary of the Senate.

Certified copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate of Porto Rico on February 25, 1922.

I, José Munoz Rivera, secretary of the Senate of Porto Rico, do hereby certify that on February 25, 1922, the Senate of Porto Rico adopted the following resolution:

Resolution.

Whereas E. Montgomery Reily was appointed by the President of the United States to the office of Governor of Porto Rico, said appointment having been made under the provisions of the organic law known as the Jones Act;

Whereas immediately after said appointment and before he knew the country upon whose government he was about to enter, said E. Montgomery Reily expressed himself in the press of Kansas City, Mo., in a manner unbecoming a fair and even-minded man by making public statements in conflict with the dignity and rights of Porto Rico;

Whereas E. Montgomery Reily has shown that he lacks the most elementary qualifications of rectitude, tact, impartiality, and mental training required by the office held by him, as has been shown by his public and official acts in violation of the organic act of Porto Rico, such as the appointment of incompetent persons to public office, the corruption of the judiciary by threatening and removing judicial officers without just cause, and the attempted coercion of the liberty of the courts of justice;

Whereas said E. Montgomery Reily, on an official trip made by him over the island, acted as a vulgar agitator, and in several speeches delivered by him expressed himself in the most insulting language against the Porto Rican flag, which is a symbol of local sentiment, and as such is consecrated and respected by the entire Porto Rican community;

Whereas the conduct of E. Montgomery Reily, in refusing to execute important laws of a financial nature, duly passed by the legislature and approved by the preceding chief executive, has created a chaotic condition in the public administration, greatly injuring the community and the credit of the island;

Whereas said E. Montgomery Reily has not only endeavored to corrupt and defame insular judicial officials, but has also tried to exercise undue influence on the federal administration of justice by publicly, personally, and notoriously seeking the modification of a sentence pronounced by the judge of the United States District Court on an officer of the insular government for having committed contempt of court, thus weakening the moral support due by all citizens to the United States District Court and to the magistrate presiding over said court;

Whereas far from being a faithful interpreter of the law and an assurance of the constitutional rights granted to Porto Rico by the fundamental law approved by Congress, E. Montgomery Reily has become an irresponsible autocrat, ignoring and despising the Senate of Porto Rico in his appointments to the highest offices in the insular government, having sought in his purpose the sole advice of members of the minority, in detriment and mockery of the rights of the legitimate representatives of the greater part of public opinion;

Whereas the conduct of E. Montgomery Reily prior to his appointment as representative of the national sovereignty in Porto Rico has been incorrect and immoral to such a degree as to deprive him of the prestige and authority indispensable in the chief executive of a community of American citizens jealous of their culture and high civilization;

Whereas the continuance of said E. Montgomery Reily at the head of the insular government is an offense against the decorum and dignity of the people of Porto Rico, and determines a state of insecurity and distrust throughout the whole of Porto Rican society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico,

First. Solemnly to accuse E. Montgomery Reily before the Congress of the United States of having violated the organic act and other statutes of Porto Rico, and of having done everything possible to discredit in Porto Rico the great Nation which is the cradle of liberty and democracy, by acting not as a true representative of the United States of America but as a vulgar agitator and an irresponsible despot.

Second. To request the United States Congress to direct a number of Members thereof to make an investigation of the conditions brought about in the administration and society of Porto Rico by E. Montgomery Reily.

Third. To request the President of the United States of America to remove E. Montgomery Reily from the office of Governor of Porto Rico for the good of the island and to vindicate the prestige and good name of the United States as assailed by their representative in Porto Rico.

Given under my hand, at San Juan, P. R., this 28th day of February, A. D. 1922.

[SEAL.]

JOSÉ MUÑOZ RIVERA,
Secretary of the Senate of Porto Rico.

DEPARTMENTS OF COMMERCE AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments House bill 10559, making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 541) thereon. I will state that as soon as possible after the District of Columbia appropriation bill is disposed of I shall call up this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask that the reading of the appropriation bill be continued for action on the committee amendments.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 24, after line 6, to insert:

Northwest: For paving west side of Connecticut Avenue, Ingomar Street to Chevy Chase Circle, 60 feet wide, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 8, to insert:

Northeast: For paving East Capitol Street, Fifteenth Street to Eighteenth Street, 50 feet wide, $37,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 10, to insert:

Northeast: For paving Rhode Island Avenue, Twelfth Street to Sixteenth Street, 50 feet wide, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 12, to insert:

Northeast: For paving Twelfth Street, Michigan Avenue to Upshur Street, 40 feet wide, $17,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 14, to insert:

Northwest: For paving Randolph Street, Thirteenth Street to Fourteenth Street, 30 feet wide, $10,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 16, to insert:

Northwest: For paving Twenty-eighth Street from Woodley Road to Cathedral Avenue, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 19, to increase the total of the appropriation for "street improvements" from "$113,600" to "$278,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the several amendments just agreed to apparently contemplate increased amounts for paving streets. Is that due to the recent snowstorm and that the streets are in such bad condition, or are these new streets which are being opened up?

Mr. PHIPPS. These are new streets where the houses have been built up practically 100 per cent and where the grading has all been done, and the sewer, water line, and other underground work has been completed. These appropriations are 50 per cent reimbursable. The owners of abutting property repay into the Treasury 50 per cent of the cost of the improvements. All these items have been approved by the Budget Bureau.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, among the items just referred to for the pavement of streets is an item for the paving of Randolph Street, Thirteenth Street to Fourteenth Street, 30 feet wide, $10,700. That, of course, is just one block. It connects Thirteenth Street with Fourteenth Street, I believe.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that the public needs out there would be very much more conserved if Thirteenth Street itself were paved from Spring Road to Shepherd Street. Would it be possible to insert a provision for that at this time? I do not know whether an estimate has been made for it or not.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that there was no estimate made for the paving of Thirteenth Street at that point. The subcommittee inspected Randolph Street and ascertained the situation there. It is not quite 100 per cent complete in buildings, but the buildings are to go up within a year in the remaining section of that street. It was the judgment of the committee that it was best to complete Randolph Street this year and to allow the Thirteenth Street item to come in next year.

Mr. FLETCHER. The committee, then, has in mind continuing the paving of Thirteenth Street, which is now paved as far north as Spring Road, I understand, on up to Shepherd Street? That would accommodate the whole region out there, as I understand it. It is a very important street.

Mr. PHIPPS. As the Senator knows, that section has grown up very rapidly, and within a year or two it will be almost solidly built up, judging from present indications.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator then proposes in the next District appropriation bill to take care of Thirteenth Street between Spring Road and Shepherd Street?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is in contemplation, I will say to the Senator.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 24, line 24, after the word "horses," to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

STREETS, ALLEYS, AND ROADS.

Grading: For labor, purchase and repair of carts, tools, or hire of same, and horses, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 15, after the word "material," to insert "and including the purchase of a motor truck at a cost not to exceed $2,000," and in line 20, after the word "purposes," to strike out "$431,250" and insert "$500,000," so as to read:

For current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, including resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements with the same or other not inferior material, and including the purchase of a motor truck at a cost not to exceed $2,000, and including the maintenance of motor vehicles used in this work, and including an allowance of not to exceed $26 per month for an automobile for use for official purposes, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 15, to increase the appropriation for construction and repair of sidewalks and curbs around public reservations and municipal and United States buildings from "$15,000" to "$20,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 19, to increase the appropriation for current work of repairs to suburban roads and suburban streets, including maintenance of motor vehicles used in this work, from "$200,000" to "$250,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for "Bridges," on page 26, line 22, after the word "repair," in line 21, to insert "including the purchase of one special motor vehicle at a cost not to exceed $2,000, and," and on page 27, line 1, to strike out "$27,500" and to insert "$30,000," so as to read:

Construction and repair: For construction and repair, including the purchase of one special motor vehicle at a cost not to exceed $2,000, and including the allowance to the overseer of bridges for the maintenance of an automobile for use in performance of his official duties of not to exceed $26 per month, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for "Sewers," on page 28, line 18, to increase the appropriation for main and pipe sewers and receiving basins from "$120,000" to "$125,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 21, to increase the appropriation for suburban sewers from "$125,000" to "$150,000."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator regarding this item? A great many criticisms have been made to me by residents concerning the management of the street department. Was anything brought out before the committee which would indicate a lack of proper care and executive or administrative activity and ability upon the part of those in charge?

Mr. PHIPPS. The testimony of the commissioner in charge of that particular branch of the work and of the officer in charge of street construction and street repair was not such as to disclose any lack of organization in doing the work, but rather a lack of money. I should say for the subcommittee that we were very favorably impressed with the testimony of Col. Keller,

Maj. Besson, and Maj. Brown, all of whom showed a very intimate knowledge of the condition of the streets and the requirements of the city. As the Senator knows, the area is very large, and there is quite an extensive mileage of streets that must be cared for. We talked with them regarding the types of machines that are used in cleaning up the streets and the methods used for dust prevention and for the removal of snow where that is necessary, which, fortunately, is not frequent. We found them very much alive to the situation and the needs of the city.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that the criticisms which came to me preceded the advent of Col. Keller. They were not directed against the commissioner but against the subordinates in the street department. There has been a great deal of complaint made because of extravagance in the laying of asphalt pavement in various sections where it was not needed. That is, they tore up asphalt where they ought not to have done it—where slight repairs would have been adequate—so it is claimed. I recall one place which was called to my attention on Florida Avenue. It was claimed generally that there was laxity and extravagance upon the part of subordinates in the resurfacing of streets. I have no personal information.

Mr. PHIPPS. I may say to the Senator in this connection that, estimating the average life of asphalt at 20 years, we have been doing less than replacing what would wear out in the course of a year. When the streets are allowed to go to a point where the water and the frost get under the asphalt, the deterioration is so rapid that the street is ruined, whereas repairs made promptly will prevent a lot of that loss. I know that these men are wide awake and are organizing the department in the best possible manner.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think there ought to be this increase over the House bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. The committee were unanimous in feeling that it was a very moderate increase. We are still within the amount which was estimated for, although, as I recall, the allowance we proposed putting in the bill is the exact figure the Bureau of the Budget approved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 29, line 19, to increase the appropriation for dust prevention, cleaning, and snow removal from "$350,000" to "$400,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 25, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out "including the purchase and maintenance of a dead-animal wagon, and no contract shall be let for the collection of dead animals," and on page 30, in line 17, after the word "business," to strike out "large apartment houses, and large" and insert "and apartment and," so as to make the paragraph read:

To enable the commissioners to carry out the provisions of existing law governing the collection and disposal of garbage, dead animals, night soil, and miscellaneous refuse and ashes in the District of Columbia, and including inspection and allowance to inspectors for maintenance of horses and vehicles or motor vehicles used in the performance of official duties, not to exceed $20 per month for each inspector for horse-drawn vehicles, $26 per month for automobiles, and $13 per month for motor cycles; fencing of public and private property designated by the commissioners as public dumps; and incidental expenses, $750,000: Provided, That any proceeds received from the disposal of city refuse or garbage shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in the same proportions as the appropriations for such purposes are paid from the Treasury of the United States and the revenues of the District of Columbia: Provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available for collecting ashes or miscellaneous refuse from hotels, places of business, and apartment and boarding houses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 19, to change the subhead from "Trees and parkings" to "Parking commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 11, to insert:

For the purchase or condemnation of a piece of ground to take the place of Columbia Heights Playground, $50,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether the purchase of this additional property for $50,000 will commend itself to the judgment of the House? Is not that bound to lead to a controversy which will in the end require the Senate to recede?

Mr. PHIPPS. I confess that the subcommittee, in deciding in its judgment that the grounds should be acquired and is necessary to provide playgrounds in that neighborhood, where we have been using property by permission of the owners, which property is going to be improved and will no longer be available, did not consider whether or not the House would consent, but the committee decided on the necessities as we saw them. Of course, we are aware of the fact that the estimate had been made and that the estimate had received the approval of the Bureau of the Budget.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 21, after the word "playgrounds," to strike out "$109,220" and insert "$159,220," and, in the same line, to strike out "to be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to make the paragraph read:

Lighting: For purchase, installation, and maintenance of public lamps, lamp-posts, street designations, lanterns, and fixtures of all kinds on streets, avenues, roads, alleys, and public spaces, including the Highway Bridge across the Potomac River and its approaches, and for all necessary expenses in connection therewith, including rental of stables and storerooms, livery and extra labor, this sum to be expended in accordance with the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912 and with the provisions of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913, and other laws applicable thereto, $430,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 11, before the word "bidder," to insert the word "responsible," so as to read:

For replacing gas lamps and fixtures and older and less effective electric lamps and fixtures, on streets, avenues, roads, and public spaces by improved electric installations, purchase of posts and fixtures of all kinds, and for all necessary expenses in connection therewith, $20,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the payment on any contract required by law to be awarded through competitive bidding, which is not awarded to the lowest responsible bidder on specifications, and such specifications shall be so drawn as to admit of fair competition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for public schools, on page 35, line 24, after "$6,000," to insert "business manager, $4,000"; and, on page 36, line 9, to strike out "$72,220" and insert "$76,220," so as to make the paragraph read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether there have been any changes from existing law in the items regarding the school-teachers?

Mr. PHIPPS. There have been no changes whatever. The schedule is identical with that of the current year.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for night schools, on page 41, line 23, to increase the appropriation for teachers and janitors of night schools, etc., from "$75,000" to "$90,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 7, to strike out:

For completing the construction of a junior high school on the site in the vicinity of the Gage, Emery, and Eckington Schools, $200,000.

And to insert:

For continuing the construction of a junior high school on the site in the vicinity of the Gage, Emery, and Eckington Schools, $200,000, and the limit of cost is hereby increased to $400,000, and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts to the extent of the increased limit herein authorized: Provided, That this building shall, when completed, contain not less than 24 classrooms.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Colorado why the limit of cost in this case was increased from $200,000 to $400,000? It seems to me that 100 per cent is a very large increase.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that the limit of cost was originally $300,000.

Mr. KING. When was that fixed?

Mr. PHIPPS. That was fixed in the bill passed at the last session making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1922, the present fiscal year. The building was authorized and work on the plans has advanced to the point where the authorities are prepared to begin construction; but it was found impossible to construct the building within the limit of cost. The Senator will notice a proviso similar to that contained in the preceding item, which has been agreed to, that the building when completed shall contain not less than 24 classrooms; so that there will be erected a 24-room building instead of an 18-room building, as was originally contemplated. We find the demand for space in junior high schools is so great that they are coming to be a very important feature in the scheme of education.

Mr. KING. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. A subcommittee, of which I am a member, have been making rather extensive investigations in regard to this matter; and I think I am betraying no confidence when I say that the members of the subcommittee are deeply interested in the junior high schools as well as in the senior high schools. I am sure we shall recommend that suitable junior high schools be constructed. The point that challenged my attention was not the fact that it was proposed to construct a junior high-school building, but that there should be a 100 per cent increase in the amount allowed for that purpose in one year.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is only an increase of one-third, for the amount originally authorized was $300,000, and it has been raised to $400,000.

Mr. KING. A year ago, as I understand the Senator, estimates were submitted, based, of course, upon investigations made and the statement of the architect, calling for $300,000, but we are now increasing that amount to $400,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; with the proviso that the building must contain not less than 24 classrooms.

Mr. KING. Does the difference in the size account for the additional $100,000?

Mr. PHIPPS. It accounts for it very largely.

Mr. KING. Or is it due to an increase in the cost of building in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PHIPPS. Oh, no; on the other hand, the cost of building has decreased slightly, and we are hoping for a further decrease in the cost of construction.

Mr. KING. We will not get very much of a decrease until the grand jury indicts some of the conspirators in the District who are holding up building prices.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to say to the Senator that we could erect a building for $300,000, precisely as was estimated last year, the plans for which are already drawn, but if that $300,000 structure were completed, as was originally intended, it would take care of but 500 students. There are now 800 students who are waiting for this building. When those facts were presented before the committee they provided for a 24-room school to cost $400,000, rather than an inadequate school which would cost only $300,000.

Mr. KING. I want to repeat that I am not complaining about the increase in size; indeed, the evidence before our committee—and we heard the testimony of some of the leading educators of the United States—demonstrated that the larger units are not only economically superior but accomplish better results. I have favored, and shall continue to favor, even larger units than 24 rooms certainly for the senior high schools, and, I think, for the junior high school as well. I heartily approve of the plan to erect buildings of not less than 24 rooms instead of 18; but I do complain against the high cost of building and of building materials and building accessories in the District of Columbia. They are now more than 100 per cent in the excess of the prices before the war, and all the efforts made to secure reductions have proven abortive.

Rents have gone up here nearly 100 per cent in the past year, instead of going down, and there seems to be a conspiracy upon the part of some real estate men and builders and certain labor leaders to continue in the District extortionate prices for building. So long as that condition exists we will have a housing shortage and all of the inconveniences and hardships which come to Government employees and to people of moderate means who wish to make their homes in the District of Columbia.

I regret very much that the Department of Justice and the district attorney do not make an investigation, even if they have to turn it over to the grand jury, in regard to these conditions in the District of Columbia. Instead of improving, the conditions in some respects have grown worse, and when the Ball Rent Act expires, unless there shall be supplemental legislation, undoubtedly there will be an enormous advance not only in the rent of buildings for residence purposes, but for business as well. It is regrettable that such conditions exist. We will have to have a Lockwood committee here to make an investigation and indict a number of people and prosecute them, as has been done in New York. The result there has been very salutary; building now is going forward in New York with considerable celerity, and prices have gone down very greatly. I have read recently that across the river in Alexandria a schoolhouse may be erected for a certain figure, whereas in Washington the cost is nearly 100 per cent greater. That shows the condition that exists with respect to building.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that the difference is due to the greater cost both of labor and of material?

Mr. KING. The cost of construction in the District is very much higher than across the river in Alexandria.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to a very remarkable process that is going on in the Federal reserve system. The law limits the stockholders of Federal reserve banks to net profits of 6 per cent. One of the results of the war was to increase the lust for big earnings, and that fever has not yet subsided. The Federal reserve banks have appropriated to themselves over and above the 6 per cent profits, $67,000,000 of the net earnings of these banks, and they have done most of this within the last two years.

Mr. President, as I understand the law, the title to the land and the buildings erected upon the land vests in the stockholder banks. Therefore, they are appropriating to themselves money which belongs to the Federal Government and to the people, and they are doing this at a rate that is startling. The country does not know it, and I crave the pardon of the Senate for a few minutes, while I put the information in the RECORD.

In the city of Atlanta they have signed contracts for a lot and a building that will cost $1,700,000. The Washington Monument, begun in 1853 and finished in 1884, cost $1,187,000. Therefore, this regional bank in Atlanta has appropriated to itself from the Government's money a larger sum than Congress and the States together during 30 years devoted to the erection of this loftiest monument that ever was reared to the memory of a great man.

The bank in Cleveland is to cost $10,000,000, five times as much as the memorial hall to Abraham Lincoln.

The bank in New York City paid $4,000,000 for the lot and is to spend twenty-odd million dollars upon the building. To that extent Gov. Strong and his associates have appropriated to their own personal use a sum of money greater than that which Louis XIV, the grand monarch, spent on the palace building at Versailles.

As I say, Mr. President, these pieces of property, aggregating now $67,000,000, become the private estate of these bankers. Are we to remain idle and allow them to commit what is really larceny after trust on so grand a scale as this? Will not the Senate investigate?

In the future, thanks to the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. HARRIS], Congress will control these building contracts.

Here is the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, who is disqualified by law to hold his office. I have said so twice; I say it now thrice, and I should like to have any lawyer on the other side dispute the proposition. I am ready to debate it with him. He is holding his office in violation of section 243 of the Revised Statutes, one of the first laws that the First Congress ever passed. It is a part of the structure of the Treasury Department that the man who holds the office shall not own Government bonds, shall not be engaged in trade or commerce, shall not own a single ship. If he does so, he violates a penal statute whose penalty is a $3,000 fine, a term in the penitentiary, and a disqualification forever afterwards to hold office. Why do we allow this man to violate the law in that way? Why do we not impeach him? Instead of that, he was placed on the board to handle the $11,000,000,000 that Europe owes us, and that Europe never intends to pay. Even now he is building a $3,000,000 banking house in Pittsburgh.

Mr. President, without taking up further time of the Senate——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, one minute, if the Senator will yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Referring to this money that is invested in the lot and the building in New York, if it had not been so invested some of it would have gone into the Public Treasury and would have become the funds of the United States Government?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Absolutely.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator mean to say that since they have appropriated this money for this purpose this lot and this building are going to belong to private individuals and the Government will not have an interest in them?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Unquestionably. They are diverting that much of the net earnings from the channels through which they should flow into the common funds of the Treasury. In morals it is larceny after trust. They are the only body of men on earth that exercise the function of fixing their own salaries. Gov. Strong assigned himself a salary of $50,000. Some of his assistants get $35,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. And all of these salaries were approved, of course, by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Precisely; after Congress had fixed the standard by allowing the governor of all the banks a salary of $12,000 a year. Here we Senators draw only $7,500 a year, and we are constantly creating new offices and paying salaries that range from $5,000 to $50,000. We have to pay our own expenses of living here. These men are paid these tremendous salaries, and then we allow them the expenses. Why, some of the allowances shown in the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury are amazing. You wonder how on earth those men traveled to that extent and went to personal expenses to that extent. It is a scandal, and the Senate ought to do something about it.

We all read in the newspapers a few days ago where a trifling sum of money was loaned out at 10 per cent interest, to be compounded every month, 25 years ago, and when the judge came to render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in a suit upon that note, the amount ran up not into millions, not into billions, but into trillions—thirty-four, as I remember—$34,000,000,000,000. Napoleon once said, after rising from a study of the compound-interest table: "The principle in those tables will devour the human race." That is what it is doing right now. These Federal reserve banks are making from 100 per cent to 200 per cent profit, after allowing themselves expense accounts which are shocking.

For instance, Mr. President, in Boston the gross earnings were, in round numbers, $7,000,000 for 1921. The expense account was $2,684,000; and after taking out that tremendous amount of money for operating expenses the net earnings were $4,283,000; being, as you will see, more than 50 per cent on the investment after they had gouged the gross earnings to the extent I have mentioned.

The Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank, which has been after my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and after which I am going now, earned gross earnings of $7,476,000. They took out, in round numbers, $2,000,000 for salaries and other operating expenses.

Mr. KING. Was part of that for rent?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; I think so; and they had left $5,505,000; and these are the men who are going into Alabama and trying to create opposition to one of her Senators. Well, we will try to create some opposition to them.

Take the New York bank, Mr. President. The gross earnings were, in round numbers, $35,000,000. They took out for expenses more than $8,500,000 for their salaries and had left $20,500,000 as net profits. That was 200 per cent upon the cash actually invested.

If a trifling sum of money like $25 loaned out at compound interest for 25 years will run up into the trillions, what will these banks do when they have already earned $246,000,000 in the space of two years? Suppose they roll that over from year to year at compound interest. What will be the result as to our people?

During the whole time that they were making these enormous profits—and, mind you, I have not stated the surplus at all; the surplus is $215,000,000—the tax they paid the Government was $125,000,000.

The original capital invested was $36,000,000, and the present paid-up capital is $103,000,000 and the surplus carried over is $215,000,000. Let them keep on compounding that for 25 years, and where will our people be? The man who controls the money controls the country. That is a truism. Every Senator here is aware of it. From Aristotle's time down to now it has been conceded that the man who controls the money controls the life of the country—necessarily so, it being its life blood so far as commerce is concerned—and if the industrial system withers and dies, the man dies with it.

I have spoken already longer than I had intended. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the editorial from the Manufacturers' Record of March 2, 1922, entitled, "Net earnings that may well startle the country" be published in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Manufacturers' Record of Mar. 2, 1922.]

NET EARNINGS THAT MAY WELL STARTLE THE COUNTRY.

The Wall Street Journal in its issue of February 6, in a comprehensive review of the operations of the Federal Reserve Board, gave some remarkably interesting facts regarding the earnings and the building operations of that system. Since the Wall Street Journal is an upholder of the Federal reserve system, none of its statements, of course, can be credited to any desire on the part of that paper to criticize the earnings or the management of the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve banks.

According to the Journal the paid-in capital and surplus and original capital of each of the Federal reserve banks is as follows:

[Last three figures omitted.]

Cities.	Original capital.[1]	Present paid-in capital.	Present surplus.
Boston	$3,217	$7,935	$16,483
New York	6,640	26,958	60,197
Philadelphia	4,156	8,723	17,945
Cleveland	4,009	11,134	22,509
Richmond	2,211	5,430	11,030
Atlanta	1,586	4,192	9,114
Chicago	4,405	14,312	29,025
St. Louis	1,861	4,606	9,388
Minneapolis	1,634	3,569	7,468
Kansas City	1,863	4,575	9,646
Dallas	1,935	4,201	7,394
San Francisco	2,605	7,380	15,199
Total system	36,123	103,020	215,398

[1] Apr. 2, 1915.

In the aggregate these banks have paid to the Government as franchise tax since they were established nearly $125,000,000.

With an accumulated surplus of $215,000,000 added to $125,000,000 paid to the Government, this shows a total of $340,000,000 as earnings since 1915, and mainly since 1919, on an original paid-in capital of $36,123,000, in addition to the earnings paid to the stockholders.

For the first three years of operation from 1915 to 1917, inclusive, the gross earnings amounted to $22,500,000, but during the next three years the gross earnings amounted to $351,000,000, and in 1921 to $122,000,000, making $473,000,000, in round figures, for the last four years of operation. That any business organization of any kind in the world can start with $36,000,000 capital, even though the capital was later increased partly by new banks joining the system, to $103,000,000, and within seven years, after paying all operating expenses, earn net $340,000,000, holding on to $215,000,000 as surplus, indicates a degree of profiteering which it seems to us puts to shame any profiteering made by any other business organization in the United States within that period.

These enormous earnings have been at the expense of the public, but they do not begin to measure the cost to the public of the management of this system, for as the rate of usury was increased by the Federal reserve system the rate of interest to the business people of the country was advanced on every dollar that they had to borrow from banks in all parts of the land, and thus an enormous additional expense was added to the burden of carrying the business operations of the country, and the inevitable result of high money rates was to destroy values, and thus the borrower and the producer were cut with a two-edged sword.

In giving the details of the earnings of the Federal reserve banks the Wall Street Journal says:

From the returns of the Federal reserve banks to hand it appears that their smaller net earnings last year, a little over half of what they were in 1920, were due in a large measure to actually higher expenses. Their gross earnings are estimated at $122,000,000, compared with $181,000,000 in 1920. Expenses in 1921 were about $38,000,000, or 31 per cent of gross earnings. Included in these expenses are deductions for sundry reserve accounts and depreciation, etc. It is evident that the Federal reserve banks had not adjusted their expenses last year in keeping with smaller rediscounts and advances. Curtailment of office forces and salaries were not such as to make much of an impression upon the 1921 figures.

Details of the earnings and expenses of the different Federal reserve banks for last year as given by the Wall Street Journal were:

As a criterion of the reduced business done last year the case of the New York Federal Reserve Bank may be cited. At the close of the year that institution had only $385,000,000 in loans to members and in investments, compared with $1,046,000,000 at the close of 1920. Discounts and advances handled during the year aggregated $30,700,000,000, compared with $50,500,000,000 in 1920 and $42,400,000,000 in 1919.

Following table shows gross earnings, expenses (including certain reserves and depreciation) and net earnings of the 12 Federal reserve banks in detail, totals being compared with previous years. In the case of Dallas and San Francisco the three items are estimated. In the case of Cleveland, only net earnings are definite. The totals for 1921 can only therefore be estimated.

The Journal adds:

According to a recent compilation, the Federal banks had incurred a cost of over $36,000,000 for new buildings. Of this, nearly $17,000,000 was for original investment of land, etc., and over $19,000,000 for building costs or remodeling. Plans for additional construction, in some cases held up on account of the present congressional investigation, called for outlays of nearly $35,000,000. This means that exclusive of undeveloped plans, the Federal reserve banks have already buildings of about $67,000,000. It is probable that when in prospect an aggregate of real estate investment for bank finally consummated in home cities and in branches, Federal reserve bank buildings may represent a total investment of about $75,000,000 or $80,000,000.

Perhaps the greatest evil to the country which has come from this profiteering system of enormous earnings by the Federal reserve banks has been the change of the moral tone or the ethical spirit of a great many bankers who have felt that if this system could be permitted to earn such enormous profits they might follow its example and do some profiteering on their own account.

Banking should be a profession of the highest ethics, if it would set an example to the business men of the country as to morality in business. To a large extent in the past this has been its policy. In the past most bankers have felt a sense of personal moral responsibility in the great work which they have done, feeling that upon their ethical standards the country at large would base its operations. But when a great banking organization, representing the National Government, carries on a definite campaign, through various reserve banks, to wreck other banks which do not comply with its demands, and which is guilty of profiteering to an extent such as indicated by the figures which we have given from the Wall Street Journal, it sows the seed for unethical conduct in banking to an extent which endangers the moral sense of the entire Nation. Business men will say if these things can be done by our bankers and great financial interests, why should we not follow their example?

The Wall Street Journal's figures were taken from the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board, but we have preferred to use its details and comments since no one can possibly charge that publication with any unfriendly feeling for the management of the reserve system.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10101), making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 50, line 20, to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $40,000 for the purchase of a site for this building is made available, to such extent as may be necessary, for the erection of the building," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the erection of an eight-room extensible building on a site west of Sixteenth Street NW., in the Ingleside section, $140,000: Provided, That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $40,000 for the purchase of a site for this building is made available, to such extent as may be necessary, for the erection of the building.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have just noted the various items which go to the construction of new school buildings, and the Committee on Appropriations is to be congratulated, and especially the Senator from Colorado, on bringing out these very splendid provisions which take care of what has been a want of the city for a long time.

I wanted to ask the Senator touching the recommendation of the commissioners as to the Western High School and the appeal of the patrons of that school. There is an instance, I understand, where the present accommodations do not take care of the number of children who seek entrance to that school, and the gymnasium facilities are not very good, and there are various other things needed. Did the committee give any consideration to that project?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that the committee did. The Senator is quite correct in his statements as to the needs of that section for additional high-school accommodations. However, your subcommittee on inspection of the building talked with the superintendent of the buildings and talked with the superintendent of the schools and others and found that no estimate had been prepared at the time estimates for other school buildings were prepared, but that the estimate for the Western High proposed addition was brought in much later; in fact, was passed upon by the Budget Bureau after the bill we are now considering had been passed by the House.

Your committee felt that not sufficient time and consideration had been given to the proposed plans, which, of course, are only tentative, but which, in the judgment of your committee, would not afford relief that would justify an expenditure of about $550,000.

The cost per room was figured at about $30,000, but of course that included an assembly hall and a new gymnasium. I want to say now that those facilities are needed for that high school. They have no fit place of assemblage for the pupils. There is one large room, perhaps almost of the extent of this Chamber we are sitting in, but the ceiling is only about 12 feet high, so Senators can see how impossible it would be to use that for any form of entertainment.

Your committee could not see its way clear to either the acceptance of the estimate based on the plans which were presented, or at this time to include in this bill an additional sum of $550,000 for school purposes. Therefore, the thought of the subcommittee, which had the approval of the entire Committee on Appropriations, was that this item should be allowed to go over until next year, and in the meantime proper plans could be prepared and made, and perhaps next year the District funds will be in better shape to afford this expenditure. I may say that not one member of the committee advocated the inclusion of an item for the Western High School this year.

Mr. HARRISON. Outside of the provisions which go toward the construction of the new buildings which are provided for, does the Senator know of any other instance in the District which really calls for more urgent action upon the part of Congress than the Western High School?

Mr. PHIPPS. Not in the high-school class.

Mr. HARRISON. That being true, then, if these buildings which are provided for are constructed, the Western High School will receive the attention of Congress next, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is my judgment.

Mr. HARRISON. I had thought I would offer an amendment to provide $550,000 for the alteration of the existing building, the Western High School, but in view of what the Senator has said, I shall not do that. Would the Senator object to having incorporated in the bill a provision directing the commissioners to have plans prepared for an addition to and the alteration of that building?

Mr. PHIPPS. Will the Senator specify what character of building?

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

Mr. HARRISON. It is to be inserted on page 52, after line 9.

Mr. PHIPPS. That will bring this amendment in at the end of all the items.

Mr. HARRISON. I will just withhold the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for the erection of an eight-room addition to the Garrison School, $140,000, on page 51, line 2, to strike out the following provisos:

Provided, That none of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid or obligated toward the construction of or addition to any building the whole and entire construction of which shall not have been awarded in one or a single contract to the lowest bidder complying with all the legal requirements as to a deposit of money or the execution of a bond, or both, for the faithful performance of the contract: Provided further, That this limitation shall in no wise apply to contracts already awarded; nor shall it be construed to impair the legal rights or status of any unsuccessful bidder on a contract already awarded: Provided further, That no architect's fee shall be paid or obligated for plans, specifications, or any professional services whatever, unless they are such as will enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or those letting a contract, to secure a legal bid within the amount authorized by Congress for the building or other project: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as repealing existing law giving the commissioners the right to reject all bids.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of the Senator why these lines were stricken out. There seemed to be some proper, legitimate restrictions upon the contractor and those who attempted the construction of the building.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that in contracting for a structure such as a school building it is often found possible to make separate contracts for certain parts of the building, thereby dealing directly with the contractors, whereas if you stipulate that the contract for the entire building, finished completely, must be given to one contractor in a single contract, that contractor will add his profit to the two or three single bids. Take, for instance, a heating plant or the electrical equipment which is necessary in one of these large buildings. It is not economical to contract for such a building complete, including those various items. That was the sense of your committee, and for that reason the language was stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 22, to insert:

For the purchase of land adjoining the Dunbar High School, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 52, to insert:

For the purchase of land adjoining the Armstrong Manual Training School, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 2, to insert:

For beginning the erection of an addition to the Armstrong Manual Training School and alterations thereto, to include an assembly hall, additional classrooms, shops, and laboratories, within a limit of cost of $500,000 which is hereby authorized, $100,000, and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts for said addition at a cost not to exceed $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. At this point the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi would appropriately come in, if it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be reported.

The READING CLERK. On page 52, after line 9, insert the following:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to have plans prepared for an addition to Western High School, including repairs to the present building, with a view to providing not less than 24 additional classrooms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to say that the amendment will have my support, and, so far as I may, on behalf of the committee, I accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to page 54, line 17.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to return to page 10 of the bill for the purpose of submitting an amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Mississippi may submit his amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The READING CLERK. On page 10, at the end of line 19, after the figures "$31,520," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall have issued and made effective an order requiring the street railway companies operating in the District of Columbia to give transportation to any one passenger for each continuous ride between all points of its main and branch lines within the District of Columbia at the rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents, and to sell six tickets or tokens to their patrons for not exceeding 25 cents, all transfer requirements and regulations as now existing and in force to be continued and respected.

Mr. HARRISON. I have offered this amendment because the fares which have been charged by the street car companies here have been very exorbitant for some time; but they were raised to the high limit, and they gave as an excuse the war and the consequent high cost of things.

The Utilities Commission have recently passed an order that the companies can sell six tokens for 40 cents. They reduced it from the old amount about one-third of a cent. One can not buy three tokens for 20 cents. If a person buys one token, he is charged 8 cents. Of course there are many poor people who never get as much as 40 cents together at one time, and consequently they have to pay the full fare, while those who are better able and have 40 cents in their pockets, get the reduced rate of 6⅔ cents a token.

The charters which were granted to these traction companies expressly provided that they were not to charge a fare of over 5 cents a person, and that they might sell six tokens or six tickets for 25 cents. So the amendment I have proposed merely places a limitation upon the appropriation, and will compel the companies, if they utilize this appropriation, to reduce their fares, so that they may charge not over 5 cents a person for a ride on the street cars.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I regret that I can not see my way clear to accept the amendment. I think it is clearly subject to a point of order, and it is my duty to make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order?

Mr. PHIPPS. The point of order is that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, Mr. President, it is purely a limitation upon the appropriations, and it does not change existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi is in the following language:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not become available until the Public Utilities Commission shall have issued and made effective an order requiring the street railway companies operating in the District of Columbia to give transportation—

And so forth.

Under the form in which the amendment is presented, the Chair——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Chair permit me to suggest that we have no rule in the Senate similar to that in the House permitting limitations upon appropriations. The House has an express rule, according to my recollection, making in order a limitation upon an appropriation, but the Senate has no such rule as that, and it seems to me this really is legislation on an appropriation bill.

I want to say that personally I am in favor of the proposition. I have been urging for quite a good while a reduction in the passenger rates on street cars in the District. I have thought that these companies have been charging exorbitant rates; but I would not like to see the principle established in the Senate that by a limitation on an appropriation we can nullify existing law, and that is what it would amount to. We nullify it for a year, we nullify it for two years, we nullify it for three years. I think it is very unfortunate that there is a rule of that kind in any legislative body.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is mistaken. There is no such rule in the House. The limitation rule applies upon general principles, that a limitation does not change existing law, that a limitation upon an appropriation is not either new or general legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection was that there was an express rule. I may be mistaken in that respect. I know it is the uniform practice.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course there is the Holman law, so called, but that has no application.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the Senate to limit the use of any appropriation that it authorizes——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not mean to interrupt the occupant of the Chair. I wanted to ask a question before the Chair rules finally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is this in effect a limitation on an appropriation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is just about to pass upon the matter, which will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desired to ask the question in that categorical form. My understanding of a limitation on an appropriation is some provision, mandatory or otherwise, limiting the purpose of the appropriation. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi does not go to the purpose of the appropriation, either in whole or in part. It simply provides that none of the money shall be spent unless the utilities commission issue a ruling. If that is in order, we can legislate on pretty nearly any item in an appropriation bill. We could say to the Federal Trade Commission, "The salaries herein appropriated are not to be paid until the Federal Trade Commission does a certain thing in the matter of a ruling or order," and practically legislate in that way. I think it is not truly a limitation upon the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON). It is true that any limitation may have the practical effect of accomplishing legislation in advance. Under the rules of the Senate the present occupant of the chair thinks that it is competent for the Senate, in providing an appropriation, to limit its use, and that that limitation is accomplished by the specification of a condition under which the appropriation may be used just as well as otherwise.

Under the form in which the amendment is presented the Chair thinks that it is not general legislation in the sense of Rule XVI of the Senate and that it is not obnoxious to the rule, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 33 of the bill in order that I may offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRANCE. On page 33, line 13, I move to strike out the numerals "$1,200" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "$1,500."

I will say that the amendment proposes to increase the salary of this electrical expert, who has been in the employ of the city government for some time; he is a very skilled worker, and has not, in my judgment, been adequately compensated for a long time. I think he should receive this increase in salary, if any increases of salary are to be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 33, after the word "expert," at the end of line 12, and under the heading of "Electrical department," it is proposed to strike out "$1,200" and in lieu thereof to insert "$1,500."

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations in considering this bill have felt that, in view of pending legislation in the reclassification bill which is now before Congress, it should not go into the question of salary adjustments at this time. No changes have been made in basic salaries in any part of the bill. If we were to open the door and grant increases in certain instances we should, in justice, go through the entire salary list and adjust all salaries. Therefore I regret that I can not, for the committee, accept the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from Colorado has said, and I shall not, therefore, take the time of the Senate to continue to urge the amendment. I also realize that the committee is acting wisely in deferring increases of salary until action is taken on the reclassification bill. I happened to know, however, of this very meritorious case, and felt it my duty to offer the amendment, which I wish might be accepted. However, I understand the position of the committee with reference to the matter. I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Metropolitan police," on page 55, line 16, to increase the number of privates at $1,460 each from "17" to "92"; in line 22, after the words "allowance of," to strike out "$480 to one inspector" and to insert "$312 to each of two inspectors"; and on page 56, line 4, to increase the total from "$1,658,286.36" to "$1,767,930.36," so as to make the paragraph read:

Major and superintendent, $4,500; two assistant superintendents, at $3,000 each; 3 inspectors, at $2,400 each; 12 captains, at $2,400 each; chief clerk, who shall also be property clerk, $2,400; clerk (who shall be a stenographer), $1,800; 2 clerks (who shall be stenographers), at $1,500 each; clerks—one (who shall be assistant property clerk), $1,200, one $1,200, three at $1,000 each, one $700; four surgeons of the police and fire departments, at $1,600 each; additional compensation for 35 privates detailed for special service in the detection and prevention of crime, $16,800; additional compensation for 14 privates detailed for special service in the various precincts for the prevention and detection of crime, at the rate of $120 per annum, $1,680; additional compensation for 1 inspector or captain and 1 lieutenant detailed for special service in the detection and prevention of crime, at $400 each; 21 lieutenants, 1 of whom shall be harbor master, at $2,000 each; 56 sergeants, 1 of whom may be detailed for duty in the harbor patrol, at $1,800 each; privates—550 of class 3 at $1,660 each, 237 of class 2 at $1,560 each, 92 of class 1 at $1,460 each; amount required to pay salaries of privates of class 2 who will be promoted to class 3 and privates of class 1 who will be promoted to class 2 during the fiscal year 1923, $6,686.36; 9 telephone clerks, at $900 each; 18 janitors, at $600 each; laborer, $720; messenger, $600; motor-vehicle allowance of $312 to each of two inspectors; 38 captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted on horses, at $540 each; motor-vehicle allowance to 20 sergeants and privates, at $480 each; 64 lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted on bicycles, at $70 each; driver-privates—36 of class 2 at $1,560 each; 6 police matrons, at $720 each; in all, $1,767,930.36.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the amendment on page 55, line 16, in the items for the Metropolitan police has been agreed to. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] last evening on the floor made a remark about the item which proposes to increase the number of police. I think it only proper to give him an opportunity to discuss the item if he wishes to do so. I shall send word to him, and if he cares to reopen the matter I would reserve that privilege.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 57, line 14, to increase the appropriation for additional motor vehicles from "$5,000" to "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 17, to insert:

Additional amount required for the erection of a station house in the suburban section of the District of Columbia, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 20, on page 59, the last paragraph being as follows:

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

SALARIES.

Chief engineer, $4,000; 2 deputy chief engineers, at $3,000 each; 8 battalion chief engineers, at $2,400 each; fire marshal $2,400; deputy fire marshal, $2,000; 4 inspectors, at $1,660 each; chief clerk, $2,400; clerk, $1,400; clerk (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter), $1,660; 38 captains, at $1,900 each; 41 lieutenants at $1,760 each; 41 sergeants, at $1,700 each; superintendent of machinery, $2,500; assistant superintendent of machinery, $2,000; 2 pilots, at $1,700 each; 2 marine engineers, at $1,700 each; 2 assistant marine engineers, at $1,660 each; 2 marine firemen, at $1,460 each; privates—428 of class 3, at $1,660 each, 71 of class 2, at $1,560 each, 12 of class 1, at $1,460 each; amount required to pay salaries of private of class 2 who will be promoted to class 3, and private of class 1 who will be promoted to class 2, during the fiscal year 1923, $2,455.44; hostler, $1,080; laborer, $1,000; in all, $1,120,595.44.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, on page 59, line 16, I move to strike out the word "twelve" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five." I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will agree to that amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator's amendment proposes to increase from 12 to 25 the number of firemen of class 1, 25 being the number asked for by the fire department. I frankly state that those preferring that request made a very strong argument and a good showing in behalf of the increase. We are giving the fire department additional fire apparatus. Personally I am convinced that the department does not have a sufficient number of firemen to handle the heavy hose, particularly when it becomes necessary to deal with a fire in a three or four story building, for only four men in each company are available to drag the hose line up the stairways. The Budget Bureau approved the item for 25 men; it has been estimated for; and, so far as I may for the committee, I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. On page 59, in line 20, I move to strike out the figures "$1,120,595.44" and to insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,139,575.44." I offer that amendment in order to take care of the additional firemen who have been provided for by the amendment just adopted by the Senate.

Mr. PHIPPS. The clerks have authority to change the totals to correspond with any amendments which may be agreed to in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Fire department," on page 60, line 8, to increase the appropriation for hose from "$12,000" to "$15,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 11, after the words "fire boat," to strike out "$1,500" and to insert "$2,000, to be immediately available," so as to read:

For repairs and improvements of fire boat, $2,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for permanent improvements, fire department, on page 60, line 19, to strike out "for one combination chemical and hose wagon, motor driven, $8,150," and to insert "for two combination chemical and hose wagons, motor driven, at $8,150 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 61, to strike out: "For one pumping engine, triple combination, motor driven, $12,500," and to insert: "For two pumping engines, triple combination, motor driven, at $12,500 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 6, to insert:

For repairs, improvements, and alterations to engine house No. 16, D Street between Twelfth and Thirteenth Streets NW., $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Health Department," on page 63, line 18, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of disinfecting service, etc., from "$6,000" to "$7,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 24, to increase the appropriation for enforcement of the provisions of an act to provide for the drainage of lots in the District of Columbia, etc., and for the abatement of nuisances in the District of Columbia, etc., from "$1,000" to "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 3, to increase the appropriation for special services in connection with the detection of the adulteration of drugs and of foods, including candy and milk, from "$100" to "$200."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, line 13, to increase the appropriation for maintaining the chemical laboratory from "$750" to "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 16, to insert:

For necessary repairs to the annex (contagious-disease ward) of the Garfield Memorial Hospital, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 2, before the word "persons," to insert "indigent"; in line 4, after the word "service," to insert "rent"; and in line 5 to strike out "$12,500" and insert "$13,500," so as to read:

For the maintenance of a dispensary or dispensaries for the treatment of indigent persons suffering from tuberculosis and of indigent persons suffering from venereal diseases, including payment for personal service, rent, and supplies, $13,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 15, to increase the appropriation for clinical examination, advice, care, and maintenance of children under 6 years of age, from "$15,000" to "$18,000."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I propose an amendment to the committee amendment, to strike out "$18,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000." The welfare work to which this fund is devoted has accomplished great good. A number of ladies who are giving their time and services to this work have advised me that it will require at least $20,000 to accomplish their purposes during the next fiscal year, and the nature of the work is such that I feel this small additional amount should be provided in order that it may not be embarrassed.

Mr. PHIPPS. The officers of the Child Welfare Society interviewed some of the members of the committee, myself included, and called attention to the fact that they had $18,000 in the bill for the current year, and that for the ensuing fiscal year the House cut that allowance down to $15,000, although $18,000 had been approved by the Budget Bureau. Our committee have restored the figure to $18,000; but I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Arkansas. I believe this is a worthy work, indeed; that it is really a necessary work; and we do not provide a great deal in this bill for strictly charitable purposes. I shall make no objection to the amendment offered by the Senator, and for the committee, so far as I may, I accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 66, after line 15, to insert:

To aid persons of moderate means who are suffering from tuberculosis, to obtain adequate sanitarium and hospital care, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on page 69, line 22, I offer an amendment striking out "$9,000" and inserting "$10,000" for compensation of jurors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 69, line 22, in the item of $9,000 for compensation of jurors, it is proposed to strike out "$9,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$10,000."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that is in accordance with the estimate. I understand that a deficiency appropriation has been asked for, running it up probably to twelve or more thousand dollars; but I am not in favor of offering amendments exceeding the estimate, so I have confined my amendment to $10,000.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of that amendment and accept it for the committee as far as I may.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, I move to strike out the two provisos beginning in line 22, page 69, and ending in line 3 on page 70, in the following words:

Provided, That none of the money appropriated in this act shall be available for the payment of jurors' fees unless the actual cost of the trial jury be taxed as part of the costs and judgment rendered therefor, to be paid by the unsuccessful litigant: Provided further, That no person in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 71, line 4, to increase the appropriation for expenses attending the execution of writs de lunatico inquirendo and commitments thereunder in all cases of indigent insane persons committed or sought to be committed to St. Elizabeths Hospital, etc., from "$5,500" to "$6,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 7, to insert: "payable one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to read:

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, payable one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $406,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 15, after the word "character," to strike out "$3,000" and to insert "and in all cases of emergency not otherwise sufficiently provided for, in the discretion of the commissioners, $8,000," so as to read:

EMERGENCY FUND.

To be expended only in case of emergency, such as riot, pestilence, public insanitary conditions, calamity by flood or fire or storm, and of like character, and in all cases of emergency not otherwise sufficiently provided for, in the discretion of the commissioners, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Courts and prisons," on page 73, line 7, to increase the appropriation for fees of jurors from "$55,000" to "$60,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 17, after the name "United States," to strike out "to the credit of the United States and to the credit of the District of Columbia in the same proportions as the appropriations for such institution are paid from the Treasury of the United States and the revenues of the District of Columbia," so as to make the paragraph read:

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL AND LYING-IN ASYLUM.

For general repairs and for additional construction, including labor and material for each and every item connected therewith, $5,000; for expenses of heat, light, and power required in and about the operation of the hospital, $15,000; in all, $20,000, to be expended in the discretion and under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol, and on July 1, 1922, the sum of $25,000 of the surplus revenues of the hospital shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 16, to insert:

Hereafter patients may be admitted to the Tuberculosis Hospital for care and treatment at such rates and under such regulations as may be established by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Gallinger Municipal Hospital," on page 82, line 2, to strike out the provisos in the following words:

Provided, That during the fiscal year 1923 the number of persons whom it may be actually necessary to employ at any one time shall not exceed the proportion that the force to attend the actual number of beds available shall bear to the force required to attend the ultimate maximum capacity of 300 beds: Provided further, That no person employed hereunder shall be paid at a rate in excess of the rate specifically appropriated for a similar grade of work for the Washington Asylum Hospital for the fiscal year 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 13, to increase the appropriation for maintenance of Gallinger Municipal Hospital from "$45,000" to "$90,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

For repairs to buildings, including repairs and alterations of old psychopathic hospital building to make it available for female nurses and employees, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 22, to insert:

Hereafter patients may be admitted to the psychopathic ward of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital for care and treatment at such rates and under such regulations as may be established by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, after line 6, to insert:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to acquire a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, said site to be located in the District of Columbia or in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia, and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $300,000, of which not more than $40,000 shall be expended for a site, and toward said purpose there is appropriated the sum of $125,000; if the land proposed to be acquired is within the District of Columbia, and the same can not be acquired by purchase at a price satisfactory to the commissioners, they are authorized to condemn the same under the provisions of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Industrial Home School for Colored Children," on page 87, line 12, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$22,500," so as to read:

For maintenance, including care of horses, purchase and care of wagons and harness, and maintenance of motor vehicle, $22,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, line 14, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,000," so as to read:

For repairs and improvement to buildings and grounds, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 16, after the word "motor," to insert "vehicle and," so as to read:

For provisions, fuel, forage, harness, and vehicles and repairs to same, ice, shoes, clothing, dry goods, tailoring, drugs and medical supplies, furniture and bedding, kitchen utensils, and other necessary items, including maintenance of motor vehicle and trucks, $50,000.

The next amendment was, on page 88, line 22, to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$7,500," so as to read:

For building and equipment for ice making and refrigeration, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Municipal lodging house and wood yard," on page 89, line 4, after the figures "$360" in line 3, to insert "night watchmen, for six months, at $40 per month"; in line 5, after the word "maintenance," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$3,000"; and at the end of the same line to strike out "$4,040" and insert "$5,280," so as to read:

Superintendent, $1,200; foreman, $480; cook, $360; night watchmen, for six months, at $40 per month; maintenance, $3,000; in all, $5,280.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on line 4, page 89, there is a typographical error. The word "watchmen" appears in the bill. It should be "watchman." I ask that that correction may be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the top of page 90, to insert:

National Library for the Blind: For aid and support of the National Library for the Blind, located at 1729 H Street NW., to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 5, to insert:

Columbia Polytechnic Institute: To aid the Columbia Polytechnic Institute for the Blind, located at 1808 H Street NW., to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $1,500.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether these institutions for the blind are owned by the Government, or are they private institutions, and is the District making contributions to private institutions?

Mr. PHIPPS. They are private institutions, but these allowances always have been made year by year. For some reason the House declines to insert the items in the bill, but invariably it has agreed in conference to allow them. They are well-conducted establishments, both of them.

Mr. KING. Is there any Government institution for the blind in the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. None whatever within the District. We have them for the deaf and dumb and for persons suffering from other infirmities, but none whatever for the blind.

Mr. KING. And does the Government, aside from these two items, make any contribution for the care of the blind?

Mr. PHIPPS. There is an appropriation made, I believe, but it is carried now in the Interior Department bill. I believe the allowance is about $12,000.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know whether any appropriation is made for caring for the blind in some institution in Maryland or Virginia?

Mr. PHIPPS. Provision is made. It is carried in a bill with which I have not been familiar, however.

Mr. KING. I was about to say that if the items to which the District makes contribution—namely, $6,500—carried in this bill are all that are paid by the District for the blind, I think the District is escaping very lightly.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that I hope in another year all of these items will be brought together in one bill, as they should be, so that upon looking at a bill Senators may know how the different establishments are cared for.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether the appropriation carried in the other bill all came out of the Treasury of the United States, or whether half of it was chargeable to the District.

Mr. PHIPPS. It has been charged for the last three years on the 60–40 basis. The District has been paying 60 per cent.

Mr. KING. The Senator now alludes to the other bill, the Interior Department bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. I refer to the other bills, one carrying $12,000, and I do not recall what the other item is, but I think it is about $6,500.

Mr. KING. Is there any supervisory care over these private institutions which are receiving contributions from the treasury of the District?

Mr. PHIPPS. Our Board of Charities are supposed to exercise proper supervision, and unless they recommend the institution as being properly conducted and under good management, they refuse to pass upon or approve any estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 11, to strike out the subhead "Hospital for the Insane," and to insert in lieu thereof "St. Elizabeths Hospital."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, line 14, to strike out "$850,000" and insert "$900,000," so as to read:

For support of indigent insane of the District of Columbia in St. Elizabeths Hospital, as provided by law, $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Public buildings and grounds," on page 94, line 13, to increase the appropriation for contingent and incidental expenses, office of public buildings and grounds, from "$700" to "$800."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Park police," on page 94, line 16, before the word "privates," to strike out "fifty-three" and insert "sixty-one," and in line 17, to strike out "$78,840" and insert "$89,720," so as to read:

Salaries: Lieutenants, $1,900; first sergeants, $1,700; 2 sergeants, at $1,580 each; 61 privates, at $1,360 each; in all, $89,720.

Mr. KING. An item was passed a moment ago, when I was absent from the Chamber, increasing the police of the District by 75. I notice that one of the newspapers this morning stated that my objection yesterday went to the inspectors. I had no objection whatever to the inspectors.

Mr. PHIPPS. Inspectors of buildings?

Mr. KING. Yes; inspectors of buildings. I did challenge attention to the large increase in the number of policemen in the District, and I observe that the number of park police has also been increased.

Mr. PHIPPS. Only an increase of eight.

Mr. KING. From 53 to 61.

Mr. PHIPPS. An increase of eight. There are in Rock Creek Park alone 13 miles of driveways, not counting bridle paths or foot paths. The park police not only cover that area of some 1,740 acres, but also care for Potomac Park. Complaint has been made by people driving through the park as to the lack of sufficient police supervision. It may not be the direct or proper duty of a policeman to see that citizens who own property adjoining park land are prevented from dumping refuse on the park property, but, as a matter of fact, they have had to pay quite a little attention to that.

The committee very carefully heard the commissioners, and particularly Col. Sherrill, who has that department in charge, regarding the necessity for these park policemen. As the Senator knows, there is quite a tendency on the part of the people to congregate in the parks, particularly on summer evenings, and stay there late at night. A very great number of complaints have been made by residents of the District as to the conduct which is sometimes carried on in the parks after nightfall.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think there should be such a large increase in the police force within the city? During the war, of course, there was a very large congestion of population in the District. I think, perhaps, the tide is receding somewhat, and it occurs to me that if we got along during the war and for the three years following the war with the personnel at the standard which it has attained there would be no necessity for increasing it now, at least increasing it by such a great number as 75.

Mr. PHIPPS. While it is true that that is about 9 per cent increase, it is further true that we have not given them increases during the preceding three years. Our force consists of 804 policemen this year. That is less than 1 man for every 560 inhabitants, and compared with the number of policemen who are employed in other large cities comparable to Washington we find that that figure is much under the average, notwithstanding the fact that the District covers a larger area than the majority of those cities with which we compared it. The committee has the figures giving the records of various cities, and we gave very careful consideration to that item of increase in the police force. The committee was convinced that it was a proper increase to make at this time, and the finding and recommendation of the subcommittee met with the approval of the entire committee.

Mr. SPENCER. May I add that during the war the park policing was very much neglected? The present force of the park police—and this has only to do with the park police——

Mr. KING. I challenged attention to the other item.

Mr. SPENCER. But, so far as the park police are concerned, there are now 1,600 acres more under their charge, running from Rock Creek Park to the Potomac, than there were when the original number of policemen was used. That is the reason why the police department requested the increase from 53 to 61. There are 500 reservations which are under the control of the park police of the city, and the Senator will see in a moment that 61 is almost an inadequate number for them, and from the testimony as it appeared before the committee, even with the 61 the parks will be nowhere near adequately protected. The number ought to be very much larger.

Mr. KING. I express no opinion in regard to the parks. I have not made sufficient investigation to determine whether or not the 61 which this bill provides for are needed. It would occur to me, however, that the number was rather too large. The population of Washington—I think we might compliment it—is very much different from that in many of the industrial centers, to which are attracted a very large number of transients and those who have the wanderlust; but, speaking generally, the inhabitants of the city of Washington are law-abiding; a great number of them are employees of the Government, and thousands have come here for the purpose of enjoying the benefits which are derived from living in the Capital of the Nation. Thousands of them are retired business men, men of means, and business women, and, generally speaking, I submit that the population of Washington is not to be compared with the population of other cities.

The needs of police protection here would be less in proportion to the number of population than would be found in many of the industrial centers and in other cities of the United States to which I might call attention, but which I shall not refer to for fear of any invidious comparison.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think that as a general proposition what the Senator states is true; but I have been surprised at the statements which I have read in the papers relative to the amount of crime in the District of Columbia. I myself know that there have been many crimes committed here, such, for instance, as stealing automobiles or breaking into garages and stealing tires. It has come to be almost a profession with some people to break into garages or to take a car from the street or to take the tires off a car, and when talking to the police about it I have been informed by them that the department is altogether inadequate; that they can not cover even the most thickly settled portions of the city with the present police force.

I will not attempt to state the amount of area one policeman must cover, but I think one beat runs from K Street to S Street; at any rate, the area which he guards is altogether too large, and he reported that right in that district there would be theft after theft, and they seem to be absolutely helpless, because the thieves can watch the policemen, know where they are, and go into the section of the beat which the policeman has left and perpetrate these crimes.

I know it is a general complaint upon the part of the policemen that they do not have enough on the force to properly guard the city, and I repeat, I was startled by a comparison of the number of crimes committed in the District of Columbia and those committed in other cities, where, I agree with the Senator, we would naturally expect a larger amount of crimes; but I do not think the statistics bear out that statement. The crime here is far beyond what it ought to be, and the policemen insist that it is because they do not have a sufficient force.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask the Senator if that is not partly accounted for by the fact that we have a much larger percentage of visitors coming to the Capital City than go to other cities of like size? It is not our own population alone whom the police must keep in mind, but they must look after the "trippers," the excursionists, and those who come here to prey upon our people.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I do not agree at all with the Senator from Utah that we do not need a greater number of policemen in Washington in comparison with the population than in other cities. Just as the Senator in charge of the bill has said, it is not the population of Washington which has to be looked after, but at all times Washington is the Mecca of many visitors. Many drive in in their automobiles from other cities and there are many crossing accidents. There is no city which can be compared wth Washington in the necessity for protection along that line.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean automobile accidents?

Mr. BALL. Automobile accidents, as well as looking after visitors of all classes who come here, because they know that the crowds are in Washington. The daily visitors to Washington are many more than to any other city, compared to the population.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, if complaints have been made to him, as they have been to me as a member of the committee, that in the past, particularly the past two or three years, the police organization has not been as efficient as it should have been, and if there have not been very many complaints about the administration of the department?

Mr. BALL. Complaints have been made, and the reply from the commissioners has always been that they had not a sufficient number, and they very frequently cited to me the fact that they have to transfer their traffic policemen from one place to another in the city as the accidents seem to occur, and people driving in their machines comment on that very freely. If there is an accident in one place there will be a traffic policeman there the next morning and for a week or two, then they have to transfer him to some other street. They have not a sufficient number to take care of the dangers on the streets. Further than that, the streets of Washington have so many avenues cutting across them that it makes it more dangerous for traffic. Instead of having only the cross streets, as there are in those cities to which the Senator refers, we have here avenues cutting in from every direction, which require more protection, especially of traffic policemen, than in the ordinary city.

Mr. KING. I have made some investigation with regard to the police situation in Washington. I think Washington has some of the finest police that can be found in any municipality. Some of the officers and some of the men on the beats are of very high character. I do believe that there have been some members of the police force who have not been up to the standard. I believe that for the past two years the efficiency of the organization has not been as great as it should have been, and there has been a lack of discipline. I think that a careful examination will disclose the accuracy of that statement. The new person in charge, I feel sure, will make some improvement, and I have no doubt that, if he will apply himself as I think he will, some of the evils that have existed will be corrected.

I do not think we need an increase of 75 in the police force. I would be willing to have an increase of 40 or 50. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will consent to make it 50 instead of 75?

Mr. PHIPPS. I would like to suggest to the Senator from Utah that this item, if agreed to in the Senate providing for an increase of 75 as recommended by the committee, will have to go to conference necessarily, and we will there develop the views of the House regarding the matter. Personally, I would like to go a little further and elicit some further information on this very point. I would prefer to have the item go in the bill as recommended by the committee, and hold an open mind when it comes into conference with the House.

Mr. KING. Will the conferees make further investigation in regard to this question?

Mr. PHIPPS. I shall be very glad to cooperate with the Senator in any possible way to elicit further information.

Mr. KING. I shall not press the motion which I was about to submit to strike out "75" and insert "50," trusting to the assurances given by the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. We are only 25 apart in the number.

Mr. KING. He has devoted himself with a great deal of ability to the preparation of the bill. I feel that the Senator from Colorado ought to be complimented for the splendid work he has performed in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in reference to the pending item. I am not opposed to the item increasing the police force 75 men. I think the first duty any Government owes to its citizens is protection. I am not sure that the citizens of the District of Columbia are now getting the proper kind of protection at this time.

I have not any sympathy whatever, though, with the cry of the Commissioners of the District. Whenever they are called upon to do anything or to accomplish any result they fall back in their chairs and say, "Congress will not give us the money." Sometimes that may be true, but often it is merely a smoke cloud to hide inefficiency. The man who, when he is charged with not fulfilling to the utmost a public duty, especially where he is charged with the duty of protecting the lives and limbs of the people of a community, contents himself with falling back and saying, "Somebody else is at fault, because I have not got enough money," is not the proper man to hold public office. If I had the authority and an officer under my charge should come to me with excuses of that kind, I would find another man to fill the job.

I have not heard a more severe indictment of the administration of public affairs than the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. BALL] has just delivered against the Commissioners of the District. I know he did not intend it as an indictment, but it seemed to me that it was an indictment. Everyone knows there are more automobile accidents in this city than in any city of its size in America or in any city near its size. We pick up the papers and almost every day find that another man is dead because he has been run over by an automobile.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BALL. Does not the Senator realize, from the construction of the avenues and streets in Washington and the fact that there are drivers from so many different States not entirely familiar with the traffic rules of Washington, that there would be a cause of more accidents here than elsewhere?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not at all. I think that is merely an excuse to hide inefficiency. As has just been suggested to me by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] it is not the nonresidents who are running over and killing these people; it is people who live in the District of Columbia and near-by Maryland and Virginia, who transact business in this city.

No; the trouble is that we are palliating offenses, which I will not call murder but which are often manslaughter, with excuses instead of trying to remedy them, just as the Senator from Delaware is giving excuses now. Because some of the streets run into avenues and there are four or five cross streets at a given point there is no reason in the world why men and women should be injured there any more than at any other place if the traffic laws of the District of Columbia were enforced and obeyed. The reason why an accident happens at places of that kind is because men drive into those places at reckless rates of speed and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will not order the police force of the city to arrest men for violating the speed regulations, but content themselves, when a man is injured or killed on the street, with sending a policeman around there for a day or two to see if another accident is going to happen in that street at that particular point.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield if the Senator wants to interrupt me.

Mr. BALL. Does not the Senator realize that the commissioners are limited in the number of employees granted by Congress?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, that is just another excuse.

Mr. BALL. Oh, no.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all it is; it is just another excuse. Of course, they are limited.

Mr. BALL. If Congress would allow the commissioners to employ only half the number of policemen they have now, would it still be only an excuse for accidents?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; but if Congress would double the police force in this town and there was not a more intelligent administration of the laws in the District of Columbia, we would still have the accidents. That is my viewpoint. It is because of a lack of intelligent enforcement of the law. If the Senator will allow me, I have no patience with that sort of excuses. When men, women, and children are killed daily in the streets, I have no patience with the men who are charged with the authority to administer the law idling in their chairs and, when some one calls their attention to the fact that these conditions exist, say that they can not enforce the law because Congress has not given them enough money or Congress has not given them enough men. If they would show by their actions that they are trying to enforce the law, they would have a Congress to appeal to that would respond if they need more money to protect the lives and limbs of the people of the District.

No, Mr. President, I am not opposed to giving the administration of the District of Columbia a sufficient force. I shall cheerfully vote for the amendment brought in by the committee to increase the police force 75 men. I would increase it more than that if necessary, because I want to cut out any opportunity for excuses for failing to enforce the law of the land. But I can stand for 15 minutes on any of the prominent corners of this town, at dusk in the evening, when the departments are closed and the business people and the clerks are returning home, and count in those 15 minutes from 10 to 15 or 20 automobilists who will drive across those corners at reckless rates of speed, and the only reason why they do not kill some one is because the pedestrian has reached the curb and is staying there. But whenever you find the halt, the lame, and the blind trying to cross a street in the city of Washington at hours of that kind, the next morning you read in the papers of a death.

If the commissioners are going to enforce the law, they would not wait for a post-mortem examination after a man has been killed. They should put a policeman on the prominent corners, and when a man drove past at 30 or 40 miles an hour, as they so frequently do, he should arrest that man, and the second time he violated the law, they should take his license away from him and not let him operate an automobile again.

I have no patience with these excuses. I am not given to criticism. I realize that men in public office labor under great difficulties. This is not the first time I have made these statements.

Right in front of my house on a quiet corner within the last three weeks I saw the reckless driver of a truck collide with a street car crossing a street. It did not hurt anybody, it did not kill anybody, because he hit only the corner of the street car and tore a piece off of it, but if he had hit the car in the middle he might have killed several people.

There is only one way in which this reckless driving can be prevented, and that is not to wait until the automobile driver has killed somebody, but to start out and arrest men every day when they violate the laws of the District, and either put them in jail or take their licenses away from them. When that is done we shall have a proper administration of the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 100, after line 5, to insert:

The jurisdiction of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, as granted in section 22, public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913 (Public, No. 432), is hereby extended to cover the following tracts of land for park purposes, to wit: The tract known as the Klingle Road Valley Park, containing about 17.21 acres, as shown on map filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, and designated as park map No. 647 D, the Piney Branch Valley Park, containing about 16⅞ acres, as shown on a map filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, and designated as park map No. 291, and the Patterson tract, known as parcel 129 (sub 2), containing about 81.76 acres; the commission is further authorized to reduce the area to be acquired in either of said tracts, where, by reason of improvements constructed or unreasonable prices asked, or for other reasons in their judgments the public interests may require and the limit hereinafter fixed to be paid for said tracts shall be reduced accordingly: Provided, That if acquired by purchase the cost of the respective tracts shall not exceed the following sums: The Klingle Road Valley Park, $186,600; the Piney Branch Valley Park, $237,700; and the Patterson tract, $600,000; and there is hereby appropriated toward the purposes authorized herein the sum of $300,000: Provided further, That the tracts authorized to be acquired by this act shall become part of the park system of the District of Columbia and be under control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army: Provided further, That an agreement of purchase shall be entered into or condemnation proceedings begun with reference to the Patterson tract within one year from the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, after line 6, to insert:

INCREASED WATER SUPPLY.

For increasing the water supply of the city of Washington in accordance with the project E submitted in Senate Document No. 403, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, including the purchase of land, $1,500,000, to be immediately available and to be expended in such manner as will afford an increased water supply at the earliest possible date: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete the said project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,450,000, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated: Provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized to acquire any lands, easements, or rights of way that may be needed in connection with this project; and whenever he causes proceedings to be instituted for the acquirement by condemnation of any such lands, easements, or rights of way, the United States, upon the filing of the petition in such proceedings, shall have the right to take immediate possession of said lands, easements, or rights of way, to the extent of the interest to be acquired, and use the same in the prosecution of the said project.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Water department," on page 106, line 3, to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$40,000," so as to read:

For installing water meters on services to private residences and business places as may not be required to install meters under existing regulations, as may be directed by the commissioners; said meters at all times to remain the property of the District of Columbia, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 110, line 20, after the word "supplies," to insert "passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That the commissioners and other responsible officials, in expending appropriations contained in this act, so far as possible, shall purchase material, supplies, including food supplies and equipment, when needed and funds are available, from the various services of the Government of the United States possessing material, supplies, passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles, and equipment no longer required because of the cessation of war activities. It shall be the duty of the commissioners and other officials, before purchasing any of the articles described herein, to ascertain from the Government of the United States whether it has articles of the character described that are serviceable. And articles purchased from the Government, if the same have not been used, shall be paid for at a reasonable price, not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage. The various services of the Government of the United States are authorized to sell such articles to the municipal government under the conditions specified and the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have been completed, except the one which was passed over.

Mr. PHIPPS. The amendment passed over is on the first page of the bill, and I ask that it now may be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The amendment passed over is on page 1, beginning in line 1, to strike out:

That 40 per cent of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, only, namely:

If the estimated net revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, are not sufficient to meet the proportion of the appropriations for that fiscal year charged against such revenues by this and all other acts, or which may be estimated to be charged against such revenues by acts that may be approved during such fiscal year, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall increase the rates of taxation on real estate and tangible personal property sufficiently to make up the difference: Provided, however, That such rates of taxation shall in no event be less than 1½ per cent nor more than 2 per cent.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the general expenses of the District of Columbia shall be chargeable to and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

For the fiscal year 1923 and annually thereafter the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia shall be fair and reasonable, and the revenues derived from this source shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous revenue.

Until otherwise provided by law the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia on tangible personal property and real estate shall be $1.75 per hundred, and other taxes shall be as now provided.

The appropriation of an amount equal to the unexpended or unappropriated surpluses of the District revenue shown by the reports of the commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States in addition to the estimates submitted for the next fiscal year is hereby authorized, and hereafter there shall be no limit upon the amount of the estimates to be submitted to Congress to meet the annual needs of the District, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

In fixing the value of improvements on any lot or tract of real estate for the purpose of taxation the first $2,000 of value thereof shall be exempt, and shall not be taken into consideration in fixing such value.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Colorado expect to conclude the consideration of the bill this afternoon?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not know of any reason why the bill should not be concluded this afternoon. The hour is not late. The bill has been read through; all the amendments have been acted upon except the one on page 1, and I do not know of any other amendments which are to be offered. We have disposed of all of the amendments as we have progressed with the consideration of the bill. It now comes down to the question of agreeing to the first amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this amendment is an amendment of great importance; it proposes to change completely the fiscal relations between the General Government and the District of Columbia; and it would seem to me that the advocates of the amendment certainly ought to present their views in support of it and to give some reasons why it, instead of the 60–40 plan, should be incorporated in the bill. The Senator from Colorado on yesterday stated that the Senate had passed a bill in reference to this matter but that the House had not yet passed it, and that the committee amendment was for the purpose of carrying out the idea embodied in that proposed legislation.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator from Mississippi is correct in his statement.

Mr. HARRISON. It would seem to me there ought to be some explanation made of that proposition.

Mr. PHIPPS. I referred, of course, to the so-called Jones bill. The amendment reported by the committee is copied verbatim from that bill as it was sent to the House after receiving the approval of this body. The Jones bill is now in the House, although, as I stated on yesterday, I have not been informed of the House having taken any action regarding it up to date. Of course, the Senate might reverse itself, but it would have to reverse itself in order to change the language of the first section of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two in reference to this matter. The general law governing the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government is embodied in the act of 1878 and provides for what is known as the 50–50 plan, whereby appropriations to meet the expenses of the District government are contributed equally from the Federal Treasury and taxes raised in the District. As the Senator from Mississippi knows, there has been quite a controversy over this question between the House and the Senate. As the Senator will remember, the House has been contending that the law of 1878 was not just and that reasonable taxes should be assessed against the people in the District, and then that the balance of the money which was needed to carry on the government of the District should be appropriated out of the Treasury. In the preceding Congress a bill passed the House known as the Mapes bill, which provided substantially that taxes raised by the District should go into the Federal Treasury, and then whatever was necessary for carrying on the expenses of the District should be paid by appropriation out of the Federal Treasury. The Senate has long been quite strongly in favor of what is known as the 50–50 plan, but the House has insisted for two or three years upon inserting in the District of Columbia appropriation bills a provision making the appropriations on a 60–40 basis. According to my recollection, the first time that that was done by the House an amendment was adopted in the Senate making the basis 50–50 instead of 60–40, and then we had quite a controversy with the House. On several occasions the District of Columbia appropriation bill has been held up on that account, particularly in the short sessions, until the closing days of the session, when finally the Senate conferees gave way in order to insure the passage of the bill.

During the present Congress this matter has again come up. It was hoped that we might obtain general legislation under which this annual controversy between the House and the Senate would be terminated. The Senate Committee on the District of Columbia reported a bill to the Senate providing for the 50–50 basis and establishing, or reestablishing it, I might say, as permanent law. That bill came up in the Senate for consideration; after consideration it was amended and as amended passed the Senate without even a division. The bill as it passed the Senate has been incorporated as an amendment to the pending appropriation bill as embodying the last expression of the Senate upon this question.

Let me say that the committee amendment is subtsantially in almost complete accord with the position heretofore taken by the House of Representatives; in other words, to use a very common expression, the Senate has "called the bluff" of the House on this proposition. Now we want to see what they will do. It is rather amusing to me to see interviews in the newspapers with the prominent leaders of the House who have heretofore supported substantially the same proposition which we have put in the pending bill, in which they are quoted as saying that the District will be ruined and that they are going to organize their forces to prevent the adoption of this amendment and adhere to the 50–50 plan or whatever it may be.

The committee felt that they should like to get this controversy at an end, and so they put in the last expression of the Senate with the view to sending the question to conference, in the hope, especially as the Senate committee amendment is very similar to the provision which the House has heretofore adopted as an expression of its views, of securing an agreement that will terminate this controversy. We may not be able to do so. The bill which we passed through the Senate is now before the District Committee of the House. Of course, if we are not able to reach an agreement in conference and get this question satisfactorily settled, we will have to go back, probably, to the 60–40 basis. It may be that the House committee will act upon the Senate bill, but if they do not see fit to adopt it, we will then try to work the problem out in conference on the appropriation bill. Briefly, that is the situation, and that is what the committee hope to accomplish. I trust that the amendment will be agreed to, so that the matter may go to conference and that we may endeavor to settle the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, of course, I would not be precluded in the Senate from raising a point of order against this provision; the point of order was made yesterday but was overruled; but when the bill reaches the Senate, I expect to renew the point of order.

I may say that I have voted in every instance for the 60–40 plan as against the 50–50 plan. The reason why I thought some explanation should be made of the proposition is that it is new. I thought the fight heretofore had been as between the 50–50 plan and the 60–40 plan; I did not know this proposition had come up heretofore.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That has been the controversy, so far as the appropriation bill is concerned, but the Mapes bill was substantially the same as the committee amendment. That bill passed the House, came over to the Senate, and the Senate amended it by restoring the 50–50 plan, with certain tax provisions. The bill went to conference, but we were never able to agree, the House conferees insisting upon their provision. The Senator will realize, therefore, that we have attempted to solve the problem by means of general, independent legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to make the point of order that I made yesterday against the first provision in the bill, on page 2, lines 13 to 26, inclusive, and page 3, lines 1 to 11, inclusive. That is the amendment that was just adopted, changing the fiscal policy touching the District of Columbia.

On yesterday the Chair overruled the point of order on the theory, as I understood—because the arguments were presented in that way—that Vice President Marshall had ruled heretofore in one case that where an amendment had been placed on a general appropriation bill in the House and was subject to a point of order, when it came to the Senate the Senate Appropriations Committee was permitted to put in another provision enlarging that provision, even though it might be subject to a point of order.

I have looked into that decision, Mr. President, and if the decision of the Vice President in that case is to be followed the point of order should be sustained.

The amendment that was placed in this bill by the House Appropriations Committee applies to the coming fiscal year. The amendment to that amendment incorporated in the bill by the Senate Appropriations Committee does not apply merely to the coming fiscal year, but it is permanent legislation. It applies during the fiscal year 1923, and thereafter through the coming years; and that is the distinction between this case and the case decided by Vice President Marshall.

The case that has just been referred to arose on the Post Office appropriation bill, and touched only the appropriation for that year. When it came to the Senate the amendment was enlarged, but it was not made permanent legislation at all; and here is what the Vice President said at that time:

> What has the Senator from Georgia to say about the contention of the Senator from Florida that the provision of the House bill is nothing more nor less than a limitation upon the appropriation; that it is not legislation with reference to motor-drawn vehicles, but simply a limitation on the appropriation? What has the Senator from Georgia to say to that?

Again:

> The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty with the ruling on the part of the Chair is a difficulty of fact and not one of law, and it arises in the disputed statement of fact between the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Georgia.
> The Chair has no doubt that Rule XVI, with reference to general legislation upon an appropriation bill, does not apply where the House puts general legislation in the bill.

That was what was cited to the Chair yesterday, and on that the Chair overruled the point of order; but the following was not read to the Chair, and the Chair did not at that time see what else the Vice President said. He further said:

> The Chair believes that when the House enters into that field the Senate has a right to pursue the field. But here is a disputed question of fact between the two Senators about which the Chair knows nothing and has no way of ascertaining as far as the Chair can see.
> The Senator from Florida is insisting that the House provision is nothing in the world save a limitation upon the expenditure of money provided by the bill for rural free service, in that it provides that the money shall not be expended upon a motor-vehicle route "until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route." * * *
> If this provision does apply to all motor-vehicle routes to be hereafter established by the Post Office Department, then, in the opinion of the Chair, the Senator from Georgia is right, and the Senate has the right to legislate upon the question. On the other hand—

Says the Vice President—

> if it applies only to those motor-vehicle routes that are now in existence, then clearly it is only a limitation upon the appropriation, and the point of order to the amendment should be sustained.
> The Chair, not being able to settle that question of fact, will submit the point of order to the Senate.

And so he did.

The Vice President again said:

> There is a clear conflict as to what this House provision means. It may mean either of two things: It may apply only to the present motor-vehicle routes or it may apply to those that are to be established hereafter. If it applies to those to be established hereafter, the amendment is in order. If it applies only to the routes now in existence, it is not in order.

Mr. President, such is this case. The House provision applied only to this year, and we have placed on it an amendment that enlarges it and makes it permanent legislation, applying hereafter as well. I submit, therefore, that it would be a very dangerous proposition if a ruling such as was announced here yesterday should be followed in the future. If the amendment offered by the Senate committee did not have the word "hereafter" in it and were not permanent legislation, then the ruling of Vice President Marshall might be followed. I submit, however, that under the ruling of Vice President Marshall the ruling of yesterday was incorrect, so I make the point of order again.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not know how the President of the Senate feels about the matter, but I think the situation is entirely different. Vice President Marshall said that the difference there was upon the facts. There is not any question about the facts here. The fact is here, and this is not pretended to be a limitation upon the appropriations in this bill. This is a change in the law relating to the payment of money for the expenses of the District for the year. Of course, the House provided that. It does not provide it by way of limitation, but it simply says that for the year the existing law shall not be followed; that instead of the 50–50 plan being followed the District shall pay 60 per cent and 40 per cent shall be paid out of the Treasury. That opens the door wide so far as the year is concerned, and it is legislation. It not only makes that change, but it changes the rate of taxation that is fixed by law. There is no limitation in that, but it actually changes the rate of taxation.

The fact that the House makes that apply only for a year does not limit the Senate in dealing with the subject. The House has gone into it, not by putting a limitation upon it but by changing for the year the terms upon which the expenses of the District shall be met. It has also, not by way of limitation, actually changed the way in which the tax rate shall be determined and the taxes shall be raised. If the House has done that for a year it is very proper for the Senate to insert an amendment making it any time that it sees fit, and then the two Houses can work the matter out. In other words, the House opened the door—entered the field, as the Vice President said—as a principle, and therefore the Senate can follow it up.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I confess that while the Senator from Mississippi was speaking I thought he was right about the matter; but the Senator from Washington has called attention to the fact that on page 1 of the bill the limitation spoken of is simply a limitation in time as to when this appropriation shall be made, and it is not a limitation upon the expenditure of the funds; so the limitation of time is immaterial so far as it relates to the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; it is an appropriation for a year.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not this the same point that the Chair decided yesterday, raised over again?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill is in the Senate now.

Mr. NORRIS. There was an appeal taken from the ruling of the Chair, was there not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senate sustained the Chair?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it, then, that it is unnecessary to take up time in debating it now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. I only want to say that I think the Chair stated most clearly the rule that should govern and the real basis for the ruling, namely:

> Therefore the Senate has an inherent right to amend the proposed legislation.

When the House sees fit to enter into that sort of a field, the Senate has an inherent right to make such amendments as it sees fit to make, and then allow the matter, of course, to be worked out in conference.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say for the information of the Senator from Nebraska that the ruling of the Chair yesterday was based on a ruling by Vice President Marshall that was cited to the Chair. I read the ruling and analyzed it to show that the Chair did not follow the ruling in that instance; but in all fairness to the Chair, that part of the ruling was not read to him, and he did not see it at that time. If he had followed the ruling of Vice President Marshall he would have sustained the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I was not in the Chamber and did not hear the point of order argued here to-day, but I was here yesterday. The matter got beyond the Chair, unless the Chair wants to go in the face of the decision of the Senate. The Senate on a vote yesterday decided this question, as I understand. If there is a different question now, I shall be glad to be informed to that effect; but it seems to me it is not a question of the Chair's decision, because, right or wrong, the Senate passed on it yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say that this matter is of no interest at all to me except as it is to every other Senator here. If the decision made yesterday is to be sustained to-day, and that rule is followed, then, of course, that would be the rule hereafter in the Senate; but I call the attention of the Chair to it because I thought yesterday he did not have all of the decision before him, and I am sure he wanted to rule according to precedent and correctly upon the proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me say that while I do not think the decision that the Senator has referred to is contrary to the ruling of the Chair yesterday, I know that there are other rulings of Vice President Marshall along the same line. I did not think about this matter coming up again, or I should have looked them up. I remember one or two decisions that he made upon points that I made myself in connection with the Post Office appropriation bill; and I think the precedents are clearly in line with the decision of the Chair on yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator in charge of the bill have any objection to letting this matter go over until to-morrow, so that the Senator from Washington can get those decisions?

Mr. PHIPPS. On account of the business that is pending, I think I shall ask for a ruling of the Chair on the point now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question does not seem to be one of great difficulty. The former Vice President stated the rule, and stated it correctly. When the House institutes general legislation the Senate has a right to amend it. That was the principle that was enunciated in the decision that the Senator from Mississippi has just read. The only element of difficulty in that decision was the question of fact. After enunciating the rule clearly and distinctly, the Vice President there said that he did not know whether the House had instituted general legislation or whether it had merely made a limitation on a proposed appropriation. That difficulty does not seem to arise here, because it seems to be perfectly plain that the proposed legislation of the House is general legislation, and, therefore, that the Senate can amend it by general legislation when it comes here.

The point of order, therefore, is overruled.

The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

UNITED STATES HOUSING CORPORATION.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the calendar the bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918. I think there can be no objection to it. It is simply to give the United States Housing Corporation authority to close up the affairs of the corporation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 4, line 3, after the word "law," to strike out the colon and the proviso down to and including the word "record" in line 11, as follows:

> And provided further, That no settlement or adjustment of any contract or other obligation, made or incurred with any municipality, or other political subdivision, under the provisions of this act, may be made until all taxes and special assessments upon the property of the United States of America, the title to which is in the name of the United States Housing Corporation, and which is situate within such municipality, or other political subdivision, shall have been first canceled or otherwise satisfied or record.

So as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918, as amended by an act approved July 19, 1919, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:
> "SEC. 5. That the power and authority granted herein shall cease with the termination of the present war as formally proclaimed by the President, except the power and authority to care for, rent, operate, and sell such property as remains undisposed of; to conclude, execute, settle, and adjust all contracts or other obligations made or incurred during the war, or in carrying out the provisions of this act, including contracts or other obligations made or incurred with municipalities or other political subdivisions for the furnishing of services and facilities to the property of such corporations, and for the construction of public utilities by such municipalities or other political subdivisions in pursuance to the terms of said contracts or other obligations; to collect the principal and interest of loans made or other sums due under obligations entered into under this act; and to take such other steps as are necessary to protect the interests of the Government and to fulfill the obligations duly incurred in carrying out the powers granted by said act. All property shall be sold at its fair market value as soon as can be advantageously done, and a reasonable effort shall be made to sell the houses direct to prospective individual home owners for their own occupancy before they are offered for sale in bulk or to speculative investors. Full power and authority is hereby given to sell and convey all such property remaining undisposed of after the termination of the present war. All deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance executed by the United States Housing Corporation by its duly authorized officer or officers where the legal title to the property in question is in the name of the said corporation, and by the United States of America by the Secretary of Labor where the title to the property in question is in the name of the United States of America, shall be conclusive evidence of the transfer of title to the property in question according to the purport of such deeds, contracts, or other instruments of conveyance, and in no case shall any purchaser or grantee thereunder be required to see to the application of any purchase money: Provided, That no sale or conveyance shall be made hereunder on credit without reserving a first lien on such property for the unpaid purchase money: Provided further, That in no case shall any such property be given away; nor shall rents be furnished free, but the rental charges shall be reasonable and just as between the tenants and the Government. The United States Housing Corporation (a corporation organized by authority of the President of the United States, pursuant to the provisions of an act approved May 16, 1918, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs,' and an act approved June 4, 1918, entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes') shall wind up its affairs and dissolve as soon as it has disposed of said property and performed the duties and obligations herein set forth: And provided further, That the corporation shall report to Congress on December 31, 1919, and on June 30, 1920, all sales made and the amounts received therefrom, together with a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures on account of the other activities authorized by law; and said corporation shall report to Congress from time to time all settlements or adjustments made under the authority hereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. FERNALD. It does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from Maine a question about it. I had a letter from a Member of the House from my State, I think, about this bill, though I am not sure that this is the bill. I do not intend to object to it, but I simply want to ask the Senator a question, in view of the fact that there are several cities in the country which have claims for taxes against this Housing Corporation.

Mr. FERNALD. This is to take care of those particular cities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator to announce, or the Secretary to state, that the bill provides for winding up the affairs of the corporation.

Mr. FERNALD. It does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not want the corporation to go out of business until it paid its debts.

Mr. FERNALD. It can not go out of existence until its debts are settled. The bill was introduced to take care of those matters.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FORT BANKS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs two bills of comparatively small importance, to which I call the attention, respectively, of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The first bill I report favorably without amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs is the bill (H. R. 9047) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the town of Winthrop, Mass., a perpetual right of way over approximately 755 square feet of the Fort Banks Military Reservation for the purpose of widening Revere Street. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to grant to the town of Winthrop, Mass., a perpetual right of way over approximately 755 square feet of the Fort Banks Military Reservation for the purpose of widening Revere Street at or near the intersection of Hutchinson Street in said town of Winthrop, Mass., upon such location as the Secretary of War may approve, and subject to such conditions, restrictions, and reservations as the Secretary of War may impose for the protection of the reservation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT ROBINSON MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I report back favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs without amendment the bill (H. R. 8193) to amend the first proviso in an act entitled "An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes," approved June 25, 1906.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first proviso contained in the act entitled "An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes," approved June 25, 1906, is amended to read as follows: "Provided, That the said tract shall be used for park and water-power purposes, and that not to exceed 5 acres thereof may also be used as a site for a pavilion to be used for the exhibition and sale of live stock, and for auditorium purposes."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF HOBOKEN, N. J.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has just sent word asking me to offer for him a Senate resolution. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table for proper disposition, as I am not aware of the disposition the Senator wants to make of it.

The resolution (S. Res. 254) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee composed of three Senators, of the Committee on Commerce, to be appointed by the chairman of such committee, is authorized and directed to investigate the claims of the city of Hoboken, N. J., for losses and damage sustained by such city as a result of the acquisition and retention by the United States of certain docks, piers, warehouses, wharves, and terminal equipment and facilities, including all leaseholds, easements, rights of way, riparian rights, and other rights, estates, and interests therein or appurtenant thereto, on the Hudson River, formerly the property of the North German Lloyd Dock Co. and the Hamburg-American Line Terminal & Navigation Co., and to report its findings to the Senate with such recommendations as it deems proper. Such committee is authorized to hold hearings and to sit during the recesses or sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, at such times and places as it may deem advisable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings and findings at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, the expenses of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION WITH CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY—RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session, with a view to the consideration of the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. LODGE. I move the adoption of the reservation in the resolution of ratification reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The reservation was read, as follows:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to give notice that immediately upon the assembling of the Senate to-morrow I shall address it on the pending treaty.

I move that the Senate take a recess, in open executive session, until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 8, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 7, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The Lord hear us while we pray: We would register our allegiance to Thee and own Thee as our God. Sustain us as we try to hold our loyalty in all integrity and in the uttermost meaning of goodness. We are before Thee not with self-approval but to ask wisdom and that it may be manifested in the ardor of our labor and in the loftiness of our purpose. Give us the mind that sees and understands and the filial spirit that counts obedience an acceptable oblation to lay at Thy altar. May Thy spirit have open access to all plans and thus symbolize Thy love so great, so free, and so impartial. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPROVEMENTS OF RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. DEMPSEY, by direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported the bill (H. R. 10766) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry as to whether or not it is necessary to reserve points of order when appropriation bills and bills similar to this are introduced in the House. It has been the custom ever since I have been here, but I have never been able to discover the philosophy of that rule which requires points of order to be reserved at this time in order that they might be made in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is it necessary to reserve the points of order now in order to make the points of order in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is simply a matter of precedent. It has always been the custom that points of order must be reserved in the House in order that they may be then made in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there is considerable reasoning about the matter in Hinds' Precedents, and while, as the Speaker says, it is a matter of precedent, yet it seems to be a precedent based on very good reason, as I have read the statements of Mr. Hinds in regard to it. Immediately upon being presented, the matter is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and he argues, and it seems to me with a good deal of force, that that being the case it is necessary that all points of order shall be reserved in the House. It is some time since I refreshed my memory by reading over those statements of Mr. Hinds.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed Senate joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a commission to represent the Government of the United States at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil, to be held at Rio de Janeiro in September next; and

S. 2716. An act to give effect to certain provisions of conventions with foreign Governments for facilitating the work of traveling salesmen.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a commission to represent the Government of the United States at the centennial celebration of the independence of Brazil, to be held at Rio de Janeiro in September next; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes. Pending that I desire to make some arrangements with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] with respect to the time to be used in general debate.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I have had requests on this side for four hours. I might perhaps eliminate 45 minutes of those 4 hours, making it 3 hours and 15 minutes for which I have very urgent requests.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have requests for about three hours. Would not the gentleman be willing to agree to six hours of general debate?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That would take off only 15 minutes of the requests that I have had, and I would regret very much to discriminate against one man out of so many.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to six hours and one-half, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the total appropriations carried for the regular work of the Department of Agriculture during the present year amounts to $38,688,059. The amount recommended in the bill now pending is $34,978,033. This sum, compared with the present appropriations, is $3,710,026 less than the appropriations for the current year and $1,554,835 less than the estimates submitted by the Director of the Budget through the President. It should be remembered, however, that the current law carries an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the purchase of forest lands in the Appalachian Mountain Range and also carries an appropriation of $2,000,000, to be loaned to farmers in the Great Plains area of the country for the purchase of seed, so that the bill in fact, eliminating new items which have been added, is approximately $700,000 less than the regular items carried in the current appropriation bill. It should also be considered that the pending bill carries three or four new items, one for the operation of the Center Market, carrying, as I now recall, about $165,000; an item for the enforcement of the packers and stockyards act carrying $410,500; and an item for the enforcement of the futures trading act which carries, I think, $103,600 or thereabouts, making the total carried in this bill, which is not carried in the prior bills, approximately $700,000.

Of the total appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, speaking roughly and generally, $18,000,000 is spent for the conduct of regulatory services, many of which are as directly of interest and concern to the consumers of the country as they are to the farmers of the country. Approximately $8,000,000 is spent for research of various kinds. Three million dollars is spent for service work, such as that involved in the inspection of fruit and vegetables, and approximately $4,000,000 is expended for extension.

There is very little change in the language of the items of the bill. Quite a number of limitations have been carried, however, and there are a number of increases and decreases to which it seems to me it is proper at this time to call the attention of the committee. The first of these limitations or legislative provisions is contained on page 3, which provides for the reimbursement of the appropriation for the general repair and mechanical work of the department from the funds of the bureaus on account of the work done by the mechanical force for those bureaus. In consideration of that provision the committee has reduced the estimate, cutting it from $100,000 to $90,000.

There is also a provision on page 4 of the bill which provides for the construction of a vault for the storage of inflammatory material now stored in various buildings of the department. This vault, it is estimated, will cost $2,500, and the cost will be prorated out of the appropriations carried for the various bureaus which will store inflammatory material in this vault. The item for the eradication of tuberculosis in cattle, at page 12, as proposed by the committee, carries $2,578,800, which is the same amount as has been spent or is being spent by the department for this work this year, including a deficiency of $600,000. The division between the administrative expenses and the amount allotted for the payment of indemnities under this bill is very different from that carried in the current bill. The current bill provides for a division between administration and the payment of indemnities of approximately 50 per cent each, while this bill calls for a division of 33 per cent for administration and 67 per cent for the payment of indemnities. It is impossible to tell exactly the amount which will have to be paid out for indemnities in any one year owing to the fact that the amount of indemnities depends upon the prevalence of tuberculosis in the territory in which the money is expended; that is to say, upon the area in which work is done and the percentage of tuberculosis of the herds that are actually tested. The testimony before our committee was that owing to the discovery of a new method of testing the cattle a much larger amount of work could be done with the same appropriation in the future. The probable ratio of administrative expenses and the cost of indemnities would be about 33-67, so the committee adopted that ratio, and we felt that its adoption would prevent the probability of any deficiency arising under this item in the next fiscal year. There is also on page 20 an increase of $75,000 in the appropriation for the eradication of the white-pine blister rust.

Up to this last year the white-pine blister rust was confined, so far as it was then known, to the section of the country east of Minnesota. During the last year considerable infection has been found in Oregon and Washington. That, however, is being taken care of in the deficiency bill. It is necessary, however, that the work of the control of the white-pine blister rust should be expanded somewhat in order to prevent the extension of the disease into new territory.

There is also a small item included for a heating plant at the Arlington Farm. The boilers in the heating plant are now more than 20 years old. Two of them were second hand at the time they were put into the plant. They are worn out, and the engineers to whom the matter was submitted by the Budget Director's office were of the opinion that they should be renewed. There is a very large collection of plants in the greenhouses at Arlington, representing a very large investment of money and also a very great expenditure of time and research, which would be entirely wiped out if there should be a failure of the heating plant during severe weather, and in order that that chance may be avoided, as well as the danger which is incident to the condition of these boilers, an appropriation of $50,000 for the installation of new boilers and a new house for them is carried in this bill.

Prior to this year the appropriation for the individual forests controlled and operated by the Forest Service have been carried in something like 139 separate forest items. It has never been possible for the committee to examine each one of these forest-reserves items and determine whether the allocation made to each of the individual forests specified in the estimates was a sound allocation or not. The amount which will have to be spent on a forest reserve depends somewhat on contingencies which can not be definitely foreseen in advance; in other words, the expenditure depends in part upon whether there are sales of timber in the forest which are consummated during the year and in part upon the number of forest fires which occur in one forest in comparison with another. In accordance with the suggestion made by the Forest Service to the Director of the Budget, the items for the 139 individual forests have been consolidated into eight forest-district items without any increase in the total appropriation for the forests with this exception, that there is allocated to the current appropriations in these districts an additional appropriation of $80,000, which is divided in this way: $50,000 additional for fire guards; $20,000 for additional technical men in these forests where the sales of timber are increasing or likely to increase; $10,000 for additional employment in connection with the grazing in the national forests.

The committee was in part influenced in granting this increase by the fact that the air patrol service, which has heretofore been conducted by the War Department in the national forests and in conjunction with the Forest Service, will be discontinued next year owing to the fact that the War Department was not willing to continue it, and in order to get an approximate amount or an equal amount of fire protection we have provided for these additional fire guards. There is also on page 32 a provision for the construction of some sanitary facilities in connection with the experimental farm at Beltsville, Md. This is quite a large farm of some 400 acres and employs 20 or 30 men altogether. There are more than 100 cattle, mules, horses, and the sewage from this farm has been deposited heretofore in a small creek or river which flows through the village of Beltsville. There has been a great deal of complaint about it, and the public health authorities of the State of Maryland have notified the Government that it should install a sewage-disposal plant to take care of this sewage. The committee has provided an appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose of construction of this sewage-disposal plant at the Beltsville Farm. There is also a new item——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Returning to the protection of the forests, other than the air patrol, how does the amount this year compare with the previous amount?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman means the total amount for the Forest Service?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Well, for fire protection?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is approximately the same as it was last year.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says with regard to the consolidation of forest reserve items. It seems to me it is probably wise to make the consolidations that have been made. Certainly it is better practice if we shall have very careful administration. It seems to me that the service should be able to get along with a somewhat smaller appropriation where the appropriations are consolidated, assuming the same area is to be cared for and the same amount of work is to be done, than when the appropriations are made for each individual forest. Necessarily in the case of appropriations for each individual forest there was some unexpended balance, or likely to be some unexpended balance, in the appropriations for every forest. With the items consolidated there are only eight items, as I understand it. Am I correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Therefore the service would undoubtedly be able to draw more closely upon its appropriations and ought to be able to get along with less total of appropriations for the same activities. However, the work on the reserves is growing, I realize. I am not criticizing the action of the committee, because I have no doubt but that they had good and sufficient reason for making the appropriations as they have. I think we shall all be very much interested, however, in watching the effect of this new policy. I think the committee will find it very interesting next year to inquire very closely as to the effect of it. At one time, if my memory serves me right, we had a lump-sum appropriation. There was some complaint of that on the ground that a very large part was used on certain national forests and very little used on other forests where it was claimed there was a real need and demand. There is just a little chance for favoritism, a little more chance for favoritism, perhaps, under the consolidated method than under the method of dividing appropriations, although of course there is a chance for favoritism in making up the estimates when the appropriations are divided.

I am very glad that the committee has modified this appropriation in this way, and I hope the new policy will prove to be a wise one. That will depend wholly upon the character of the administration of the reserves.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman well knows there has been a deficiency in this item practically every year, running from $57,000, or thereabouts, to over $3,000,000 in one year. The deficit, I think, has averaged $567,000. The forester has for a long time felt that the deficiencies could be reduced and the total expenditure of the Forest Service diminished by increasing the regular force on the national forests and catching the fires at their inception, instead of following the policy which we have had to follow heretofore of keeping the regular force in the forest at a rather low point and taking care of the forest fires on an emergency basis, with a resulting deficiency. As a matter of fact, in the last two or three years we have very gradually and very slightly increased the appropriations for the regular fire-fighting force in the forests, bringing a gradual decrease in the number of fires and a gradual decrease in the damage done in these forests and a gradual decrease in the deficiency appropriations. On the whole, I think the policy so far has rather proven itself.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman happen to have before him the figures which show the appropriation for the Forest Service in the last fiscal year, the total receipts from the sale of timber, and the total receipts from the sale of grazing privileges?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not have the total appropriations in a statement combined with the sales of timber and the receipts from the sale of grazing privileges. I can, however, give the gentleman the figures of the receipts from the sale of forest timber and the receipts from the sale of grazing privileges. How far back does the gentleman want to go?

Mr. MANN. I just asked for the last fiscal year.

Mr. ANDERSON. The last fiscal year. In 1921 the receipts from the sale of timber amounted to $1,775,901, as compared with $2,067,295 in the preceding year, while the receipts from the grazing privileges in 1920 were $2,486,040. It has not all been paid in, but the grazing receipts for 1921 will amount to about $2,130,174.

Mr. MANN. That is between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What are the total appropriations carried in this bill for the Forest Service?

Mr. ANDERSON. The total appropriations carried in this bill for the Forest Service is $6,532,302, as compared with an expenditure last year, including deficiencies, of $6,990,302.

Mr. MANN. A considerable proportion of the amount expended is recovered back to the Treasury?

Mr. ANDERSON. About two-thirds of it. Of course, the last fiscal year was not a fair guide, because the sales of timber and the grazing receipts from the forests were affected by the conditions which have affected other industries, and were considerably lower last year than in the preceding year.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not want to destroy the continuity of the gentleman's thought, but I wish to refer to another branch of this service, on page 71, under miscellaneous items, for the acquisition of additional lands at the headwaters of navigable streams, under the act of March 4, 1911. I presume that is the Weeks Act, is it not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The Committee on Agriculture has been holding quite extensive hearings on the question of extending that act, and I think the sentiment of the committee is very much in favor of it, and I am, but we got indirect information from your committee that you took the position that you did not have the power to appropriate additional amounts unless the organic law was extended, and I was anxious to know if that is the gentleman's opinion about the matter?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, my opinion about it is just this, and arises from this situation: I have been of the opinion ever since I knew anything about this particular item, that whatever policy is adopted ought to be a continuing policy. That is to say, there is no economy in spending a million dollars in the purchase of these various lands in one year and building up the organization necessary to survey and consummate those purchases, and then the next year make no appropriation at all, necessitating the destruction of the organization you have built up and which cost money to build up.

But it seemed to me that the policy, whatever it was, should be determined not by the Committee on Appropriations but by the Committee on Agriculture, and that the Committee on Agriculture should determine whether or not this policy hereafter was to be a policy of spending a million or two million or three million or four million dollars a year. When those favoring this policy came before us last year I told them I was willing to give them an appropriation last year with the understanding that before the item came up in the next year in the appropriation bill they would go to the Committee on Agriculture and ask that committee to determine the policy by which we should be guided in the future. I told them that so far as I was concerned a further appropriation should not be made until this policy was determined.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I agree with the gentleman. Now, I want to ask the gentleman what is this $50,000 supposed to take care of? Is that simply to keep the organization together, or what is it for?

Mr. ANDERSON. That will simply enable them to consummate the contracts already made, to make the surveys and do the work incident to the consummation of the purchases that have already been made or the purchases that are in contemplation of making and which there is moral obligation at least to consummate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. But, of course, it is not sufficient to extend the work any?

Mr. ANDERSON. It will not be sufficient to provide surveys of additional land in case an additional appropriation is made for purchase, as I understand it. Now, in addition to the items to which I have referred, there is an increase in the appropriation on pages 44 and 45 of the bill of $200,000 for the control of the brown-tail and gypsy moth. There are now two infestations, one in New England and one in New Jersey. That in New England has been there for several years, and that in New Jersey for two years. There is a possibility of eradicating it in New Jersey, and it is clearly desirable that this be done if possible, if it can be done with something like a reasonable expenditure of money. In other words, it is cheaper to eradicate these infestations by a considerable expenditure of money at the outset, if you can, than to attempt to control them, which involves a considerable expenditure for all time to prevent the spread. The committee was convinced that an additional appropriation was absolutely necessary for this purpose if there was to be any hope at all of regulating the moths in the New Jersey district and keeping them from spreading very rapidly throughout the West.

In the division of publications, on page 49, there have been consolidated all of the mimeographic activities of the Government, so that this work, instead of being done throughout the various bureaus, is now done under the division of publications. We have also consolidated eight small items which covered expenses for labor-saving devices, for stationery, twine, and a number of other small items, which we thought would be more economically and more conveniently handled under one general item.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Has the appropriation for the distribution of seeds for buncombe purposes been eliminated from this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the gentleman that the committee did not report the provision for the congressional seed distribution. That is not included in the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Thank God for that. I am glad of it.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is one considerable reduction on the face of this bill in the items for the extension of activities of the Department of Agriculture along the line of the work now being done under the Smith-Lever Act. These items are now carried in four separate items. The first of these items carried $715,720 and was for farm demonstration work in the North. The second carried $634,800 for the same sort of work in the South under a general camouflage of boll-weevil eradication and control, the third was a small item of $16,360 carried for supervising expenses in connection with the extension services of the Government, and the fourth was a general item of $1,500,000, which was originally made for the purpose of advancing the maturity of the Smith-Lever Act by three years. The first three items have been consolidated in one item in this bill with a reduction of $53,280, and the fourth item, which is now the second item, has been reduced from $1,500,000 to $1,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I was interested to know why the gentleman made the statement that this work was done throughout the South under the camouflage of exterminating the boll weevil.

Mr. ANDERSON. I did not mean that in any invidious sense. What I meant to say was simply this: It has been carried as an item for the extermination of the boll weevil. As a matter of fact the work has been exactly the same as the farm demonstration work done in the North, and I do not think there is any reason why they both should not be carried in the same language and under the same head. There is no difference in the character of the work done under them.

In explanation of the reduction of $500,000 in this item on page 55 I would like to say this: As I have just indicated, this appropriation of $1,500,000 was first made in 1920, on the theory that it was necessary to expand production and that there ought to be a county agent in every county in the United States. In order to provide for that we appropriated $1,500,000, which had the effect of maturing the Smith-Lever Act three years earlier than it otherwise would have been. This was done with the idea that as $500,000 became available under that act the committee would deduct from this appropriation. However, that was not done until this year. This year the $500,000 matures under the act, and we have reduced the item in this bill by $500,000, so that the department next year, notwithstanding this reduction, will have the same amount to spend for these activities as last year.

It might be interesting to know that during the current fiscal year the total amount for extension purposes contributed by State, county, and Federal Governments is in excess of $18,000,000, and next year will be very close to the $20,000,000 mark.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell us just how much the State, county, and local authorities have expended? Or just approximately?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not the exact figures here, but approximately my recollection is that of that $18,000,000, $7,433,280 represents the expenditures of the Federal Government.

Under this bill the Bureaus of Markets and Crop Estimates are consolidated with the Bureau of Farm Management and Farm Economics, so that on the basis of two years ago the Bureau of Agricultural Economics now includes under this bill the Bureau of Markets, the Bureau of Crop Estimates, and the Bureau of Farm Management.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the bill show how much money is appropriated for each of these several divisions?

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not give the gentleman that information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I mean in the total, whether it is segregated in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is not segregated in the bill. It would have to be calculated out of the bill to determine just how much is for each individual service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was speaking more particularly of the expenditure for the Bureau of Markets and the Bureau of Crop Estimates.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the gentleman that there is no change in the lump-sum items of the bill at all. In other words, we simply took the general farm-management item, of which there is only one, and carried it bodily over into this consolidation without changing the language at all. The only consolidation that is made is a consolidation of the statutory rolls of the two bureaus, which are consolidated exactly on the existing basis, with the exception that the head of the Bureau of Crop Estimates is eliminated and the head of the Bureau of Farm Management is eliminated and one or two other employees are eliminated as a result of the consolidation of the statutory rolls.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As far as I am concerned, I should not feel very badly if they were all eliminated, because I have not been able to discover any great benefit from either of these two activities which I mentioned last.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman will find the same target to shoot at this year as he did last.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Is the chairman of the subcommittee prepared to give his own opinion as to the value of the daily market reports published by the Bureau of Markets?

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, that is a general question, which can be answered only by generalization. There has been a good deal of complaint recently, particularly with reference to the cotton statistics, and occasionally there has been very great complaint on account of the grain statistics. Two or three years ago there was complaint that the live-stock statistics did not go out as promptly as they should, but I am under the general impression that live-stock statistics are now being gotten out fairly promptly and with a fairly wide degree of dissemination.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. If the gentleman will yield further, I think the annual report of the Department of Agriculture states the number of subscribers to whom copies go out as something like 43,000, and these market reports are all issued from Washington, as I understand it.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The information is collected daily at Washington; and my understanding has been—I may be mistaken—that it is circulated from Washington. If the gentleman will pardon the further interruption, he knows that the markets at Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Louis, Indianapolis, and all the great centers for grain and stock furnish their subscribers daily with a market report which reaches them much earlier than the Government report, and it is a feeling quite general that these reports are fully as reliable as those which emanate from the Bureau of Markets. I have wondered if the duplication is really necessary and if it is worth much to the individual subscribers.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think if the gentleman will just cast his memory back over the period before we had any Government statistics on live-stock prices he will agree that the service is very much better on both sides since the Department of Agriculture entered the field.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. "The gentleman from Kansas" casts his memory back, and he has been very familiar with this subject as a practical stockman and shipper for 45 years, and he has not become convinced that there is great benefit to the subscribers to the Government market reports, taking into consideration the limited number of personal subscribers who receive these reports as compared with the enormous number who are served by the daily reports published at the markets I have mentioned.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would not be surprised if the gentleman should find that a good many of the private reports to which he refers are based largely upon original information obtained from the Bureau of Markets.

There is some new language on page 71 designed to eliminate an experimental station which has been established for some years at New Iberia, La. There is a good deal of history connected with the establishment of this station. Gentlemen will remember that when sugar was placed on the free list in the tariff bill of some years ago there was a great deal of apprehension as to what might be the effect upon the sugar-cane growers of Louisiana, and it was thought necessary that they have some assistance in converting their production from sugar cane to live stock or something of that sort, and this station was established with that in mind. It has gone along now for seven or eight years at a cost of about $50,000 a year, and a large amount, perhaps $60,000, has been spent on buildings.

It is now discovered that the land on which the station is located will produce very little, if anything. It is only a few inches above the water table in the region, and the whole proposition is badly located. It should be redirected and relocated if it is to be conducted at all. So we carry a provision authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of the property and the cattle owned by the Government at this point with the idea that if a showing can be made it will be relocated at some other point.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. MANN. If the commissioners did not have sense and knowledge enough to locate the experimental station in a proper place, what hope is there that they will have knowledge and sense enough to do anything of benefit with the experiment hereafter?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think they are doing any good with it at present, and we have proposed to eliminate it.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. Did the department recommend the elimination of this station?

Mr. ANDERSON. It did not.

Mr. MARTIN. Upon whose recommendation was the provision put in?

Mr. ANDERSON. The committee arrived at the conclusion as a result of the testimony brought before it. Of course, the department did not recommend its elimination; it seldom recommends the elimination of anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in saying that it is not doing good work. I think it is doing remarkably good work for that section of the country.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is not well located and can not produce the feed necessary for the stock that they have at the station. It is not a question of genetics; it is not a question of breeding, but a question of the variety of cattle feed that can be raised in this section of the country to sustain live-stock production, and from that point of view it is badly located.

Now, I think that completes, in a general way, the principal items involved in the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to inquire something about this item of $165,000 for the Center Market.

Mr. ANDERSON. That appropriation represents something less than the amount that is now being expended in the operation of the Center Market. The salary roll basis is substantially the same as the present salary roll, with the exception that some supervising officials have been eliminated.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thought the Center Market was leased out.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman does not have any idea of what is down there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Likely not, but I do not see why this expenditure should be made.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the first place, there is a large refrigerating plant which had to be operated, and in the second place, there is a large amount of service in connection with the icing and refrigerating, and the whole business has to be superintended under the law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I might say that they have in my town an icing plant beside which anything that they have at the Center Market, even if they had the whole building full of ice, would be very small, indeed, and if it requires any such expense to carry it on, I am mistaken.

Mr. ANDERSON. This involves an administration expense to the Government, including the warehouse foreman, the receiving clerks, assistant superintendents, chief engineer, administration assistants, and accountants of $28,680 as compared with the salary roll of the market company of $39,008. It involves a personnel in the engine and boiler rooms of the average of $12,840 as compared with $12,960 by the market company. It involves an expenditure of $12,000 for salaries in the repair shop of the Government as compared with $12,077 of the market company. It involves the payment of salaries to provide a porter force in the storage plant of $8,520 as compared with $8,792 for the market company.

There is an item of approximately $58,000 for repairs and remodeling of the plant, which is an expense somewhat higher than the expense of the Market Co. The whole interior has to be repainted and the refrigerating plant has to be rebuilt and some new machinery purchased, all of which was not involved by the Market Co. last year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How much revenue does the Government get out of it?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not the exact figures, but it is larger than the expense of operation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A little larger than the expense of operation?

Mr. ANDERSON. $280,000 last year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell us how much the plant cost?

Mr. ANDERSON. It has never been ascertained yet. A commission was created and has been at work on it for three or four months, and I am sure the gentleman would not expect me to have in my head information that they have not been able to get in that time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I should not expect the commission to get through with it inside of 10 years, judging from the way other commissions have proceeded. I had forgotten that for the moment or I would not have asked the gentleman the question, but in any event there ought to be some profit out of this thing.

Mr. ANDERSON. The profit this year will be very largely absorbed by the expense incident to the reconstruction of the refrigerating plant and work of that kind which is to be done. The gentleman can realize that in property of that kind about to be taken over by the Government the repairs to the plant would not be kept up to a high degree, with the result that the plant has greatly run down.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. With reference to the eradication of the barberry, is there any change in the amount given for the next fiscal year as compared with what is in effect for the present year?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is no change in that item.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Did the department recommend any increase in the item?

Mr. ANDERSON. There was no increase recommended in the Budget.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What about the appropriation for white-pine blister rust?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is an increase in that appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. Chairman, in this somewhat materialistic age we are rather prone to gauge the value of things by their money return. I have asked the Department of Agriculture to make a statement showing some of the accomplishments of the department along scientific research lines and in connection with the regulatory services, and as well in connection with the services like the fruit and vegetable inspection, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement which the department prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN AGRICULTURE.

Those who have watched the progress of agriculture in recent years, the striking increase in the demand for scientific information regarding the multitude of processes in growing, marketing, and producing farm crops constitutes one of the striking features. The demand for information and the demand for increasing investigation by which this information is discovered or created is continually increasing. The application of this information to actual practice is much more prompt and much more general than even a decade ago.

LENGTH OF DAY.

It has been known and recognized for centuries that native plants are adapted to their particular environment, so that they develop seeds, fruits, bulbs, or tubers, as the case may be, in time to serve for the propagation of the species. Just what the factor was that provided this regulation of the activities of the plant has never been known.

It has been thought that it was the difference in the intensity and composition or quality of the sunlight, the range of temperature, the fluctuation of day and night temperature, and other factors have been investigated.

Recently a study of the effect of the length of day was undertaken, and it was found that by artificially regulating the length of the daily light period many plants are readily forced into flowering and fruiting out of season, or, on the other hand, these activities may be indefinitely delayed. In a similar manner it has been shown that the formation of bulbs and tubers is largely conditioned by seasonal change in the length of day.

It now appears that a very large number of the phenomena of the adaptation of plants to different environments are controlled by the length of the daylight period. These discoveries open up a tremendous field for further scientific development. It is probable that this is one of the factors that explains the constant movement of civilization toward the more temperate regions during the many centuries past. It has long been known that the maximum productivity of most of the food plants is found near the northern limit of their adaptation, and it is probable that the explanation for this will be found in the influence of length of day.

This discovery will enable the scientists to test the possibilities of modifying a plant so as to adapt it to different environments in a preliminary way without the expense of testing it in each one of these different regions. In this way it will undoubtedly be possible to extend beyond the northern and southern range of many plants far beyond their present limitations by subjecting them to extreme changes and selecting those that more readily respond to the process. It will enable the plant breeder to force plants into flowering at any given time, and thus enable him to hybridize plants that can not normally be utilized on account of difference of time in flowering. The commercial applications of this discovery will undoubtedly be very numerous; one is already in operation. The Maryland Mammoth tobacco is a very valuable type but does not mature seed in this section. By growing the seed plants in Florida in the short days of the winter period it is found to seed abundantly. It has already been found that the adaptability of different varieties of alfalfa to different regions can be more rapidly determined by subjecting them to tests with different lengths of daylight than by any other method.

This reaction to the length of day has been found to be a very wide application in nature. It has been experimentally proven that lower forms of animal life respond to changing day length, and this seems to be the most satisfactory explanation of the phenomena of bird migration that has been suggested. Many other applications will undoubtedly be found.

IMPROVEMENT THROUGH BUD SELECTION.

It has long been held that by budding and grafting the valuable features of a given variety of fruit might be transmitted to all the progeny unchanged. Recently investigations have proved that there are wide differences in the productive power and commercial value of budded stock. This has been worked out by the department in a careful study of the oranges, lemons, and grapefruits in California and certain strains of high production have been selected.

From these proven high-producing varieties scions and buds have been distributed in large numbers. This work has already proven so valuable that the California Fruit Growers' Exchange has organized a bud department, through which the propagating work of the high-producing trees is made available to nurserymen and fruit growers, thereby insuring so far as possible the production of a uniform, highly desirable quality of fruit for marketing in future years. Nearly 1,300,000 buds have already been distributed and the demand is increasing. Two hundred and seventy-five thousand buds were supplied in three months of the past year.

Undoubtedly this discovery will only be a stepping-stone to others in other lines of production. The apple, pear, peach, plum, and grape are similarly propagated, and if uniform and high-yielding varieties of these fruits can be definitely established it will be of tremendous importance in the development of the fruit industry.

EXPANSION OF DATE CULTURE.

The United States has within its borders almost an endless variety of climatic conditions, a variation far greater than can be found within the confines of any other great nation. From the extremely short season of our northern borders and high altitudes to the extreme Southwest, which contains the hottest place in the world from which meteorological reports are obtained, is an extremely wide variation. Rainfall also varies from 4 inches to over 100 inches in different regions under many variations in temperature. The earlier settlements of this country were started in the temperate regions and have spread from there outward in all directions, usually taking with them the plants and animals adapted to this median climate. Recent researches have shown that other plants and animals are much more highly adapted to some of these extremes, and will give far more profitable returns when once their requirements are ascertained.

The date industry, which has flourished on the Sahara Desert, has in recent years been partially transferred to the deserts of the Southwest. In southern California, Arizona, and Texas nearly 200 varieties have been tested, and out of these two have been selected of outstanding value. The first to be established in the Southwest, the Deglet Noor, the choicest of the dates of the western Sahara, has been growing in the Southwest for 10 years, and there are now nearly 10,000 plants in this country. There is a Deglet Noor Date Growers' Association, using up-to-date scientific methods for the curing, standardizing, packing, and marketing of this variety. The second valuable variety, the Saidy, which, unlike the other, improves rather than deteriorates in storage, was found just before the war in the oases of the Libyan Desert. This date has shown so much promise that heavy importations are now being made, and 10,000 offshoots will be planted in America before the end of this season.

The experts who have studied it have no doubt but that date culture will prove to be an important new fruit industry where the climate is suitable and irrigation water is available. Several million dollars have already been invested, and there is every reason to expect that it will develop to a twenty-five or fifty million dollar industry. The natural development of this industry must, however, be slow, because the date palm is only propagated by offshoots, of which only a limited number are produced during the early life of the palm.

The department has only been studying date culture for 20 years, but has accomplished more in a scientific way than has been accomplished in the Old World in 20 centuries.

CEDAR RUST OF APPLE.

Pathologists discovered the relation of the cedar fungus to the disease of apples over 30 years ago, but little practical application was made of it until recent years. Within the past two or three years these investigations have reached the point where methods of commercial protection could be recommended. Organized efforts to eliminate the cedars from the apple regions most seriously affected had been made and great saving to the apple growers and an increased production of apples for market have resulted.

APPLE SCALD.

Immense losses have been suffered annually from this storage disease of apples. After long investigation the disease was recently found to be due to gases emanating from the apple itself and deadly in its effect when closely confined in the package. Two methods were then tried for its control—one by ventilation, the other by absorbing the poisonous gases with oil wrappers. The first method has been only partially successful under ordinary storage conditions. The oil-wrapper method has proven to be a complete commercial success.

APPLE ROSETTE.

Immense loss to fruit growers has been suffered for years through the western regions due to an obscure physiological disease called apple rosettes, or chlorosis. Much time and money have been spent in the investigation of these problems with but little success. Recently it was discovered that the planting of a legume, such as alfalfa and clovers, have proved to be a specific remedy for these diseases. In the same way cowpeas and velvet beans have had the same effect on citrus chlorosis and the pecan rosette and allied diseases which were seriously threatening these industries.

WHEAT IMPROVEMENT.

The varieties of spring wheat in the great wheat producing regions have almost all been changed in the past 30 years. The rapid increase in results in plant breeding work in the past few years has enabled the development of still better varieties either because of their higher yielding value, better quality, or greater rust resistance, with the result that 11,000,000 acres of one new variety (the Marquis) were planted last year, and much of the remainder was planted to other improved strains. Even in the winter wheat sections improved varieties of Turkey and such as the Kanred, which have been proved to be highly rust resistant, have been substituted for the varieties previously grown.

LEGUMES.

Tests of different varieties of leguminous crops have resulted in the selection of satisfactory varieties of soy beans with a resultant tremendous increase in the number of acres devoted. A number of oil mills have been established for the handling of this product, and America bids fair to successfully compete with the Old World in this item.

Continued studies and improvement of varieties of sweet clover have resulted in a similar increase in the plantings of this soil renovating crop. Red clover has been rapidly failing throughout the United States for reasons that are not well understood, and the sweet clover is coming just in time to take its place.

The development of early maturing varieties of velvet beans have rendered this crop available to large areas, especially of the southern region, and has resulted in a tenfold increase in the acreage devoted to this crop.

The increase in the use of legumes is one of the most hopeful factors in the fight for the establishment of a permanent agriculture which is to mean so much for the future prosperity of the Nation.

TUBERCULOSIS.

Tuberculosis work was originally started with the idea of testing and preventing the interstate shipment of tubercular animals. This rapidly developed into the accredited herd plan whereby instead of testing individuals tests were limited to herds in which all individuals would be subjected to tests, and when a herd had been found to be free it was given an accredited certificate. This work proved to be so popular and successful that the demand has always exceeded the ability of the department to carry it out. Eight thousand two hundred herds have been tested and fully accredited as free from tuberculosis, while at the close of 1921 more than 27,000 herds were on the waiting list, showing the widespread appreciation of this effort. In the course of this work this disease has been practically eliminated from 100 counties in 23 States, and has resulted in the gradual but steady decrease in the amount of tuberculosis found in the herds that are being tested.

The wonderful success of this movement gave encouragement for extending the work to a definite program of complete eradication of the disease. Taking the county as a unit it was found possible to secure cooperation in the testing of every herd in the area, and in the course of time of the eradication of the disease and the accrediting of the entire herd. Within the year the first county was officially declared to be free from this process, and the work is under way in a large number of counties in various States. As in the accredited herd work, the limitation of funds available has prevented its inauguration in all of the herds desiring it. In Michigan 29 counties are actively engaged in the work and 4 others are ready to begin. In Iowa 2 counties are at work and 12 other counties have made application. In Wisconsin the entire northern section is working toward this basis. Tuberculosis eradication is moving with very much greater rapidity at the present time than tick eradication did at its inception, and bids fair to rival the wonderful success of that other movement in eradicating this disease, with its tremendous losses from large areas of the cattle-producing region.

TICK ERADICATION.

In the United States tick eradication is 70 per cent completed, and is going forward at the rate of about 40,000 square miles per year. A large amount of well-bred live stock, especially of dairy herds, is now flourishing in the area freed from the tick. This work is costing about 32 cents per acre. The extra milk given by one good cow in one day would be more than enough to pay for the cost of eradicating ticks from an acre.

HOG-CHOLERA CONTROL.

Hog cholera was up until a few years ago a scourge which menaced the swine industry, and spread swiftly from time to time through entire herds, leaving death and destruction in its wake. Although due to several causes, this achievement is essentially the outcome of the preventative-serum treatment, combined with active field-control work. As the result of this campaign losses from hog cholera have declined from about 120 per thousand in 1914 to 38 per thousand in 1921, the lowest swine mortality figure on record.

One of the most recent of the many important scientific and practical discoveries in parasite control has been the method of handling the deadly round worm of the hog. This method has received thorough and practical tests under farm conditions in Illinois with striking results, and is now ready for practical application throughout the industry. The announcement of this discovery has aroused widespread interest, and 26 copies of the motion-picture film showing the process are in almost constant use carrying this message to the people.

NEW BREED OF SHEEP.

The department's sheep-breeding work for range conditions has developed a new type, the Columbia, which had on the average more wool, mutton, and heavier lambs than the best types of range sheep heretofore used.

HORSE BREEDING.

The utility horse being developed at the Wyoming station has proved so popular that there has been a large demand for this breed in the western section.

BETTER CHEESES.

The dairy division has so perfected its method of standardizing the production of high quality Swiss cheese that it has become well established in the commercial industry of this country. In fact, American-made Swiss cheese was recently shipped to Switzerland. Similar success has been achieved in the production of Roquefort and Camembert and other types of cheese formerly obtainable only from abroad.

PEACH CURCULIO.

A year ago the peach growers of Georgia and the southern section generally were in the depths of despair. One-half of their expected peach crop had been destroyed by the extraordinary attack of plum curculio and brown rot. The department was appealed to, experts were sent to study the situation, clean-up methods were employed, and an active spraying and dusting campaign was inaugurated with a net result of the shipment the past year of the largest crop that the State has ever marketed. The entire situation of these fruit growers has been changed from one of extreme pessimism to one of confident optimism.

THE PEACH BORER.

The new remedy for this insect—para-dichlorobenzene—has been demonstrated as successful beyond the slightest doubt and has been adopted by the growers with remarkable promptness. The extreme injury of this pest has threatened the industry and the growers are turning to this remedy with such rapidity that its use apparently will be almost universal in the course of two or three years with savings running into the millions of dollars.

SAN JOSE SCALE REMEDY.

If the tests of the last year or two are confirmed during this season the department expects to announce a more efficient and cheaper remedy for the San Jose scale than has been established heretofore.

SWEET POTATO WEEVIL ERADICATION.

Only two small infestations of this weevil remain in Georgia and a similar area in northern Florida. Every condition looks favorable for the complete extermination of this insect in this large commercial area, thus saving losses running into the millions of dollars that would otherwise have occurred.

CELERY SPRAYING.

The celery industry of two counties in southern California dropped from 11,000,000 acres to 2,000,000 acres owing to the attack of a celery insect. A method of control has been worked out so that there is no reason why the industry should not again resume its original proportions.

TIPBURN OF POTATOES.

Tipburn of potatoes has caused serious and widespread losses to the potato industry throughout the northern region in the past few years. This has been discovered to be caused by a leaf hopper, and experiments have demonstrated a practicable and efficient method of control by spraying with Bordeaux mixture. Potato production was doubled in many commercial fields last year where this remedy was applied.

OX WARBLE.

Methods of treatment of cattle infested with warbles have been developed which make it possible to rid the herds of this grub with a minimum of effort and expense. During the coming season it is planned to demonstrate its effectiveness when applied to a whole county with the expectation that the use of this remedy will become widespread and that ultimately it may result in an organization for the entire eradication of this pest.

PINE BEETLE CONTROL.

This beetle has killed trees with 1,500,000,000 board feet of lumber value in the past 10 years. During this period methods of control have been constantly increasing in success, until recently the department has been able to put on control of considerable areas. Its success in this small area work has been so pronounced that the States of California and Oregon united in requesting the United States Government to join with them in a clean-up of over 1,000,000 acres of Federal, State, and private land with a stumpage value of over $25,000,000. The protection of this entire area is expected to be accomplished with the expenditure of less than $150,000.

THE GIPSY MOTH.

A widespread outbreak of this seriously injurious insect was discovered in New Jersey less than two years ago. Already the department has the infestation reduced to a small fraction of its previous numbers and hopes by unceasing watchfulness to be able to continue this reduction to a point where eradication may be brought about. This insect spreads rapidly by means of the wind, and if the New Jersey area is not entirely eradicated, it will undoubtedly spread through the New England region and westward to the Alleghenies where its proclivities for stripping and killing the forests will make it a pest of tremendous magnitude.

FOREST FIRES.

The Forest Service has been gradually increasing in economy and efficiency of fire control until now its fire-suppression cost is $16,000,000 and the number of fires and the area burned have been gradually but steadily decreasing from year to year.

FOREST RESOURCES.

Nearly a billion feet of timber are now being cut annually from the national forests, and at the present rate of increase this will be doubled within a short time. The national forests can furnish seven times as much timber as at present and still keep within the current growth and replacement. As other supplies are exhausted this reserve will be called on and the forests of the Nation will become a resource.

The forests furnish grazing for over 9,500,000 head of live stock, and with all their efforts toward increasing the carrying capacity they have not been able to keep up with the demand.

The forest products laboratories have eliminated enormous losses in the use of timber by perfecting methods of seasoning and preservation and by eliminating wastes in the manufacture of commercial products. They have tested out the paper-making quality of over 100 species of American woods and have brought into commercial use a number of species formerly discarded as waste.

IMPROVED CANE SIRUP.

The department has perfected a process for preventing cane sirup from fermenting or crystallizing under ordinary conditions, and has succeeded in getting this established on a commercial scale. This will enable the cane producer to make a sirup of uniform and satisfactory consistency which should be acceptable on all markets and should result in a great expansion in the industry.

CITRUS BY-PRODUCTS THROUGH INVESTIGATIONS OF THE DEPARTMENT.

It has been possible to utilize the cull and surplus oranges, lemons, and grapefruit, and those that have been bruised in handling as the result of investigations of the department in processes of utilization. As the result of an experimental laboratory in Los Angeles 4 companies are manufacturing lemon by-products and 20 concerns are producing orange by-products. This work has created an outlet for practically all of the cull and surplus citrus fruits of the California region and has developed a new American industry.

SWEET POTATO SIRUP.

Sirup from sweet potatoes is now being manufactured on a commercial scale and is being introduced into the trade for baking, candy making, and table purposes. The possibilities of this as a commercial industry lie largely in the utilization and marketing on the part of the sweet potato crop which hitherto it has not been practical to either store or ship to northern markets. Potatoes that are too small or too large for table use or for commercial canning are as useful for sirup making as the perfect ones.

DUST EXPLOSIONS.

As the result of the investigations of the department the number of explosions in thrashers in the Pacific Northwest has been reduced from 300, with a property loss of $1,000,000, in 1914 to less than 60, with a property loss of $15,000, at the present time. Practically no explosions have occurred in thrashers equipped with safety devices as recommended. The work on the prevention of explosion in flour mills and grain elevators has been equally successful. During 20 months previous to 1917, 5 disastrous explosions occurred, resulting in the loss of 36 lives and a property loss of $6,500,000. A nation-wide campaign was put on at that time, and not a single explosion occurred in a plant where the precautionary measures recommended by the department had been adopted during the next 20 months.

FARM MANAGEMENT.

This work has furnished much information of value on the cost of production of different farm crops and live stock and the relative cost under different methods of handling, thereby leading to the adoption of more efficient and economic methods. It has studied the relative cost and usefulness of the horse and tractor. It has studied the problems of tenancy and helped bring about uniformity in leasing contracts. It has studied the problem of the economic use of the present farming area and the possibilities of extension. It has furnished valuable information with reference to the shifts in American agriculture and their causes, and will be in a position to recommend bases for further readjustments in relation to conditions as they arise.

CONTROL OF PREDATORY ANIMALS AND REDUCTION OF STOCK LOSS.

The Biological Survey has in the past few years organized an almost nation-wide attempt at the control of predacious animals and rodent pests, and has as a result of this interested the States and communities very largely in the support of the enterprise. As a result of this campaign over 300,000 coyotes and 4,000 big gray wolves have been killed, and stock losses that used to amount to over $20,000,000 a year have been rapidly reduced. In the same way the losses from prairie dogs and ground squirrels have been notably decreased in many areas, and the methods of controlling them have been so thoroughly perfected that they will be carried out in many more in the near future.

RABIES OUTBREAK.

An outbreak of rabies on the Pacific coast which spread from Oregon southward to California and extended across the deserts into the Wasatch Mountains, and in which more than 2,100 people were bitten, 59 of whom died; more than a million dollars' worth of live stock was destroyed by this same outbreak by the rabid animals. This menace at one time threatened to spread to the entire United States, but prompt action on the part of the Biological Survey in poisoning and trapping the coyotes which were spreading the disease absolutely exterminated it in five out of six States and brought it under practical control in the sixth, thus eliminating what appeared at one time to be a national menace. The campaign for the eradication of the house rats is just now reaching the stage in which the predatory animal work was a few years ago, and undoubtedly tremendous losses by these pests will be prevented in the near future.

NEW POISON.

A new and more effective method of poisoning predatory animals has been worked out within the last year. Two men working in northern Arizona for one month during the past season destroyed coyotes on such a scale that the carcasses of over 300 were found. These results with those achieved in the rodent work indicate the probability of eventually eliminating these pests and relieving agriculture and stock growing from the heavy drain to which it has long been subjected from the inroads of these animals.

The fur-farming industry has now reached a growth of aproximately $8,000,000. The reindeer industry of Alaska, which has been hampered by lack of proper methods, is believed to be capable of development from the present size of 200,000 animals up to 4,000,000 and thus provide Alaska with an industry the income of which will exceed that of the precious metals and be second only to the fisheries.

THE PINK BOLLWORM.

The pink bollworm menace to cotton has been kept in control and very notable progress toward the elimination of this pest from the United States has been made.

The State of Louisiana was entirely free from this pest in 1921 so far as could be determined by the most intensive field inspection, and the large area in the southwestern part of the State has been free from this pest now for over two years, and cotton growing in this section under regulation will be resumed.

The areas in eastern and central Texas have been enormously reduced; in fact, but a single infested boll and a single bollworm were found in the huge Trinity Bay area in 1921.

The pink bollworm has never reappeared in the Hearne area, one of the original points of infestation, now for a period of five years, and extermination is apparently assured for that district.

All of the States concerned—Louisiana, Texas, and New Mexico—are giving adequate cooperation and particularly in the case of Louisiana and also in Texas have made considerable cooperative appropriations. The outlook, therefore, is more favorable than ever before and if this pest can be eradicated and kept out of the United States it will mean the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars annually to the cotton crop.

THE POTATO WART.

The potato wart has been held to the limited districts in mining sections of Pennsylvania, western Maryland, and West Virginia. The determination of the fact that many important varieties of potatoes are immune to this disease and the enforcement of the growing of such immune varieties in the invaded section, together with quarantine control, has accomplished this purpose and eliminated very largely the dread of disaster to the potato crop of this country which the discovery of the invasion of this disease first occasioned.

QUARANTINES AGAINST INSECT PESTS AND PLANT DISEASES.

The department is enforcing quarantines against the importation of injurious insect pests and plant diseases from all the countries of the world. With the cooperative assistance of Florida and California especially, this quarantine is maintained at every port of entry to the United States and is serving as a constant protection to the agricultural, horticultural, forestry, and nursery interests of this country. In this work it annually inspects and safeguards importations totaling several hundred million dollars. Last year over 8,000 contraband shipments were intercepted at other ports than those on the Mexican border. Many of these were infested with injurious pests.

On the Mexican border 20,000 cars were fumigated in the past six months and 31,000 contraband parcels and shipments were seized. Many of these parcels contained cotton seed, much of which was infested with the pink bollworm. Others contained fruits infested with fruit flies and other injurious insects. A few examples may give a better understanding of this service.

There have been intercepted during the short period since this service was inaugurated 192 brown-tail moth nests filled with half-grown larvæ, 36 egg masses of the gipsy moth, each one of which may contain from 500 to 1,000 eggs, 59 examples of the pink bollworm with cotton seed, a good many of which came in through northern and eastern ports of entry, one big shipment of broom corn from Italy heavily infested with the European corn borer, numerous interceptions of Mediterranean and other fruit flies with imported fruits from tropical countries, 35 shipments of citrus fruits infected with citrus canker, and some hundreds of other pests, involving at least a dozen of probably great importance not yet established in this country. Two specific illustrations of these interceptions follow:

Exclusion of a potato enemy, probably worse than any now occurring in the country: Early in February an inspector of the board discovered on a vessel coming into the port of New Orleans 1,000 pounds of potatoes taken on in Mexico. These potatoes proved to be riddled with the large grubs of a potato weevil, the entry and establishment of which in the United States might very easily jeopardize the entire potato crop of America. This lot of potatoes was burned. This and closely related weevils infest potatoes on the Andes Mountains of South America and apparently also in Mexico. Fortunately, with the original distribution of the potatoes from these regions to other quarters of the world this weevil was left behind. No tuber-destroying pest of this kind is known anywhere else in the world and the potato tuber has been practically free from injury. This is only one of several interceptions of this pest.

A new establishment of the pink bollworm prevented: A regular Pandora's box was intercepted by the inspector of the department at Baltimore, Md., February 23. It contained, among many other things—plants and seeds—59 small packages of cotton seed from Brazil, infested with living larvæ, pupæ, and adults of the pink bollworm. Incidentally, this interception indicates the grip which this great cotton pest has obtained on Brazil in the course of a very few years. If this seed had not been intercepted through the effective work of the plant quarantine inspector, the innocent-looking personal package would have carried to the heart of Mississippi, the destination of the passenger, enough pink bollworms to have started an invasion in that State which might have gotten entirely out of control before discovery. This interception alone is worth to the country many times the cost of the administration of the entire port inspection service, State and Federal.

CITRUS CANKER.

Three or four years ago the citrus canker was threatening to absolutely annihilate a $300,000,000 citrus industry in the Gulf States, and its presence there was seriously threatening the entire citrus industry of California, of approximately twice that magnitude. To-day the citrus canker has apparently been eradicated from every commercial orchard district in the South and there only remains the task of watching the formerly infested centers and the clearing up of scattered infestations in outlying regions in Louisiana and Texas.

SOIL SURVEY.

The survey, in cooperation with the States, is progressing at a rate of a little less than 40,000 square miles per year and has covered about 37 per cent of the total land area of the United States. These surveys furnish the basis for further studies by the department and experiment stations on the fertilizer needs and methods of handling these soils. They also furnish the basis for accurate extension work of methods already worked out on similar soils in other regions.

ROAD WORK.

The department has studied the effect of hard tires, rubber-cushioned tires, and inflated tires on trucks and their relative disintegrating effect on concrete. This study has shown immensely greater destructive effect of the heavy truck, especially on slight inequalities in the road or worn places in the solid-rubber tires. These studies will enable us to build roads that will withstand reasonable truck service and formulate regulations for the prevention of the abuse of roads.

Other studies have shown that the failure of many concrete roads has been due to conditions of the subgrade, and pointed out methods of remedying these conditions so that permanent roads can be built in the future. With the road-building program involving as much expenditure as at present, these studies are highly important and will effect tremendous savings in increased efficiency of the roads built. With highway improvements going forward at the rate of 24,000 miles annually, with 10,000,000 motor vehicles out on these roads, and with an army of a million men, with a total annual expenditure by the Federal, State, and local governments almost double the whole cost of the Panama Canal, these discoveries, which go directly to the foundation of the science of road building, will yield their return to the people of this country so great and far-reaching as to be practically beyond estimation.

SERVICES.

The department is furnishing a large number of valuable services to the public. Many of these—in fact, the majority of them—are of much more value to the consumer than to the producer. All of these services are being improved from time to time, their efficiency increased, and more economical methods introduced. The meat inspection protects all importations of meat and all meat in interstate commerce. As all meat concerns do interstate work, it results in the protection of practically all meat in the country except the local butcher shop.

The weather service is furnished daily to all the people in the country and even hourly in emergencies in the form of storm warnings, frost warnings, floods, and other emergencies. The development of the frost-warning service has enabled whole orchard valleys to protect their holdings against frost danger. The flood warnings have enabled the saving of millions of dollars of property and many human lives. Hurricane warnings reduce to a tremendous degree the hazards of the shipping industry.

The Crop Reports give us a monthly basis of estimation of production and the Market Reports a daily index of market trends. They also furnish annual summaries, estimates of stocks from time to time, and all available information with reference to production in foreign countries.

The department supervises the pure-food legislation, preventing fraud, adulteration, and misbranding of the thousands of articles that make up the foodstuffs of the country.

The extension work carries the message of every new discovery directly to the community to which it is applicable and encourages its use. It encourages the organization of cow-testing associations, of better-sire associations, of community improvement, of crops and live stock, and in general serves as a connecting link between the progress of organized science of agriculture and the farmer in the field.

The Forestry Service protects the forests from fire, arranges for the sale of timber, and supervises its cutting so as to insure reforestation, regulates grazing, and in general acts as a manager of the Nation's most important single asset in such a way as to annually increase its productive value and its future potential worth.

The road department supervises and directs the building of every mile of highway on which Federal funds are expended, thus tying the State and Federal expenditures into a single uniform system. The requirements for Federal cooperation are such as to have brought about a tremendous improvement in the efficiency of the personnel of the State highway commissions, and thus indirectly has contributed to an increased efficiency in the expenditure of every dollar of State as well as national funds.

The department as a whole considers itself intrusted with the development of the agricultural interests of the Nation in their broadest and most comprehensive sense. It recognizes that the development of an adequate supply of food and raw materials is fundamental to the development of a prosperous, enduring Nation, and directs its efforts to that end.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would say to my colleagues on this side of the House that at this time I think it is unnecessary for me to make any speech on this bill. I want to say, however, that in the deliberations of the subcommittee preparing the bill there was absolutely no politics, and nothing was done which was actuated by sectional prejudice or discrimination. The entire committee had their heads and hearts together in an effort to bring back a bill that would forward the interests of agriculture in the United States, and we think we have done it. [Applause.]

I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10730, that it found itself without a quorum, and he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 325 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he handed in a list of the absentees to be printed in the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 40 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, much has been said recently with reference to the appropriations by this Congress and by the last Congress. Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, juggled the figures down to about a billion and some odd dollars. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] did some more juggling and brought them down to something over a billion dollars the other day, but it is not a question of opinion, it is a question of the facts of record. I hold in my hand the actual records made up by the clerks of the Committees on Appropriations in both Houses. The Congress for the fiscal year of 1922, under discussion, appropriated $4,780,829,510. It is not a question of debate or of opinion. This statement carries also with it the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture since 1882, and I call the attention of the committee to the astounding fact that in spite of the depressed conditions of agriculture at this time and the struggle that is being made in behalf of that industry, the Republican Congress in this bill, while finding plenty of money for other activities in support of special privileges, for the first time in 15 years has reduced the appropriation for agriculture over $3,000,000.

I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and I think I am within my rights when I present the record of a most extraordinary procedure a few days ago. This is not a personal matter; it is a matter of principle. If my own floor leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] were to come before the Committee on Agriculture, of which I was at the time a member, and should undertake to dictate to that committee what its duties are, what it can do and can not do, what it should do and should not do, what it must do and must not do, if he were to presume to have that autocratic authority and that notion of his duties, I would speak of his procedure precisely as I shall of the dictatorial procedure of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the Republican floor leader of this House.

I want it particularly understood that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] let it be known that he wanted to appear before the Committee on Agriculture. On page 14 of the official stenographer's report he so states that fact. The Committee on Agriculture, eager to do everything possible for the distressed agricultural conditions in this country, gladly invited him, for it had been announced that he wanted to come. So last Tuesday he came to the Committee on Agriculture, and for an hour and a half proceeded to assail the bills pending before that committee for the benefit of agriculture in this country in these depressed times. I do not know with what authority the gentleman from Wyoming came to that committee. He appeared to have commanding authority, but I do not know whether his authority was from the White House, authority from Dr. FESS, Republican chairman of the congressional committee, or authority from the millionaire steering committee, or authority from the organization of his party. He certainly appeared to have commanding authority, and he appeared to speak with a superabundance of wisdom superlative in form of a certain kind, but he was shockingly short on information as to the contents of the measures pending for relief of agriculture. I do not know whether it was a mosaic or composite from the White House, Dr. FESS, and the steering committee, or whether it was the effusion of a great single individual intellect; I do not know which, but he seemed to possess much wisdom, telling the committee what it should do and what it should not do. Why did he come? He knew that these pending bills before the Committee on Agriculture were so strong before that committee, right as they are and worthy as they are, that that committee was about to report them out unanimously, and he knew, too, that if the Purnell bill reached the floor of this Chamber increasing the service of experimental stations in every State in this Union—he knew that if that bill reached the floor of this Chamber it would pass in spite of him, and he went there to assault it on the side. He did. Now, gentlemen, I hold in my hand a report of the official stenographer. It is not revised and it is not compressed or extended. It is exactly what he said. Gentlemen will recall when he wanted to say something he did not want the country to know about he always told the stenographer to lift his pen.

I remember what he said when the pen was lifted—and the committee members do. He took us through a most charming trip; he journeyed us over the vast plains of the great West and portrayed what seemed to be his young, innocent, and heroic life individually—his early career. He finally reached the point on the thirteenth page of this closely written stenographer's report. Mr. RIDDICK asked, What about the stabilization of agricultural products? The gentleman from Wyoming spewed it from his mouth, scorned it, denounced it, and ridiculed it until nobody else said a word about it while he was in the room. Then, on page 14, he came to the bill he came there to assault. Referring to the Purnell bill, which is a bill to enlarge and extend the experimental stations in the different States of the Union, he attacked it vigorously, persistently, and forcibly, and, of course, he rambled around it for 14 pages before he got to it. But he said it was out of the question, substantially, to consider any bill on agriculture that entailed additional appropriations. He said, "I have expressed a willingness to come and talk about this bill," and then he wandered away again. It was very entertaining—delightful. He wandered on and on again and on again until he came to the nineteenth page, and then he said that the Purnell bill was a bill that he knew something about. Mr. PURNELL insisted that his bill meant to reduce the cost of production to the farmer, and the gentleman from Wyoming startled the committee with this astounding statement. He said: "I think I know quite a bit about experiment stations." Now, we never found out what "quite a bit" was, and we do not know yet; and when Mr. PURNELL insisted that it was to improve farming the gentleman from Wyoming made this statement. He said: "You claim it will help the farmers to help themselves. What is proposed in the bill is to help the professors." That is "quite a bit" about the subject of experiment stations.

If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will spend one hour eagerly studying the testimony presented before the Committee on Agriculture by Dean Russell, of the University of Wisconsin, proving the value and imperative need of the Purnell bill to the farmers of the country, I confidently predict that the gentleman from Wyoming will come back to the Committee on Agriculture and apologize for his assaults upon the Purnell bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when we brought up the question of these various activities for the relief of the farmers, Mr. MONDELL said that there was no money for public buildings, no money for anything we would like to do for the farmers. He said, "We will cut the river and harbor appropriations to the bone. We propose to cut everything." Then I said to him, "What about the Sheppard-Towner education bill?" and that is when he told the reporter to lift his pen, but I am going to tell you what he said. He said, "Oh, no. No gentleman informed would for a moment believe that the Sheppard-Towner bill or any bill of that kind will be even considered by this Congress." Is not that what he said? Of course he said that. [Applause on the Republican side.] He sent aglimmering the ambitions of a lifetime of Mr. TOWNER in his education bill and the great soldier, Brig. Gen. Sawyer, in his ambitious Department of Public Welfare schemes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will yield, gladly, but do not take up so much of my time. You are taking a lot of my time before you start. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I did not say before the committee——

Mr. ASWELL. Did not say what?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not say before the committee that no bill like the Sheppard-Towner bill would ever be considered by the Congress. I did say that it would not in my opinion be considered this session of this Congress, and that was what I was talking about in regard to all these bills—that I did not think they should be considered this session of Congress.

Mr. ASWELL. Now, let me see what the gentleman did actually say. It is not a question of veracity. I will read his own language in the official stenographer's report. Let me answer that question. The gentleman from Wyoming, discussing this agricultural legislation, said that there is no constitutional warrant or authority to do this thing and that there is no authority to do any of this sort of thing we were discussing before that committee. That was his language. I will read it again:

> I do not know of any authority in Congress to do anything of that kind.

I do not say, sir, that you said you would never consider this bill, but you said that this Congress would not.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I can not yield further.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must not misstate what I said before that committee.

Mr. ASWELL. What better evidence can I have than the stenographer's report?

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever there is in the stenographer's report stands, but the gentleman's alleged recollection is quite another thing, and when I spoke about unconstitutionality——

Mr. ASWELL. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. MONDELL. I was talking about the fixing of prices in time of peace.

Mr. ASWELL. I want to call your attention to this fact, that after the gentleman from Wyoming came and insisted that no constitutional authority existed to aid the farmers, in 30 minutes we were assembled in this Chamber and we listened to the President of the United States call upon Congress to stabilize shipping in the country.

The question arises, How does it happen, in the opinion of the gentleman from Wyoming, that there is no constitutional authority to stabilize agriculture when the same Constitution permits the Congress to stabilize railroad and ship owners of the country? That is the question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming in his philosophy reminds me of the young fellow who was studying medicine and practicing with an old doctor. The old doctor took him to see a sick Irishman. The patient had a high temperature, and the old doctor said, "Get up and eat some corn beef and cabbage." The next day the Irishman was back at work. Then the young doctor went to see a sick German, who had a high temperature, and he told him to eat corn beef and cabbage. The next day the German was dead. The young fellow made a note, "Corn beef and cabbage will cure an Irishman of high fever, but will kill a German." That is the philosophy of the gentleman from Wyoming. The Constitution cures the difficulties of railroads and shipping, but is death for the farmer.

I was in Wyoming twice. It was my impression that there are farmers in that great State, but after hearing Mr. MONDELL's assaults upon what the Committee on Agriculture is trying to do for the farmers, I am convinced that I was mistaken, because he could not possibly have farmer constituents. I am sure now that he represents not farmers, but railroad and ship owners, as revealed by his interpretation of the Constitution against the farmer, but in favor of private corporate interests.

We had a most interesting speech here the other day. I wonder if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is in the building. I wish you would send for him, because I want to make some observations about his speech. Dr. FESS is a schoolmaster; so am I. But Dr. FESS has strayed away from the tenets of the faith. The ideal of the schoolmaster is to learn the truth and speak it with exactness. Dr. FESS has strayed away in political discussion. I saw a Negro in France, black and sleek, meet a Moroccan.

Our American Negro undertook to talk to the French Negro. The American Negro spoke in English, of course, and the Moroccan in French. Finally the American Negro turned away in disgust and said, "That fool has been over here so long he has forgot how to talk his own language." Dr. FESS has played cheap partisan politics in Congress for so long he has forgotten to speak the language of the schoolmaster, which puts accuracy above everything else in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He makes one accurate statement in reference to this administration. He makes one statement that is accurately true, but it is astounding; it amazes you in the fact that it reveals so much. He gives five specific policies of this Harding administration. He names four, and then the climax, the fifth one, is that the policy is to delay every new thing carrying a burden on the Treasury. Why, of course, the country knows the policy is to delay everything, but it is amazing that the gentleman from Ohio would confess it and print it in the RECORD. Delay is the policy and is so asserted by the gentleman from Ohio. In enumerating the achievements of this administration, asserting that only a billion and a half would be appropriated for the expenses of the Government and that the administration now has a balanced budget, claiming credit for the Federal reserve banking system and highway construction acts, he puts foremost in achievements the emergency tariff bill. Ah, gentlemen, it is an unfortunate claim.

The emergency tariff bill became the law on May 27, 1921. Chicago wheat No. 2 was selling on that date at $1.57¾. It went down and still down until wheat got out of the farmers' hands, and then the Republican Congress thrust $20,000,000 into the market for buying grain for Russia in an effort to force the price back—although the grain was out of the hands of the farmer before that was done; to-day the price of the same wheat in the same market is $1.32½—25 cents a bushel cheaper than when the tariff bill passed. That is an achievement of the administration.

Corn was selling on that day at 60 cents and is selling to-day at 57 cents. These figures are taken from Wallace's Farmer, owned by the Secretary of Agriculture, certainly the highest authority on questions of that kind. To verify that, here are some figures gotten up by the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress. The same trend of prices on wheat and corn is shown in Boston and New York as in Chicago—the same ratio of differences. The price of sugar, for example, under the emergency tariff bill declined 1.1 cents a pound, and all other farm products have met the same disaster. I could name a dozen articles, but these are sufficient to prove the principle. And the emergency tariff has not done one solitary thing to help any farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] makes so much noise and so much ado about it, it has not been worth one nickel to a farmer. If he could find anything in the administration worth a dime, I do not know what he would do.

But I must hurry on. He claims that this administration deserves credit for adding $25,000,000 to the farm loan banks of the country. The record shows that the Democrats in this Chamber undertook to make it $50,000,000. Mr. WINGO made the motion, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made a speech against it, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] joined the gentleman from Wyoming on the roll call and voted against the $50,000,000 and helped to vote it down to $25,000,000 for the farm banks of this country.

Yet he claims that that is one of his party's achievements. He speaks of the packers' bill and the grain futures bill. I voted for those bills after listening to the hearings for months, but I decided it was the best thing to be gotten from a Republican Congress. The packers were for the packers' bill and the gamblers were for the grain futures bill. Neither bill is of any value to the farmer or grower.

Now he speaks of the work of the Commission on Agriculture, a commission made up of splendid men. They have made two reports, and they have brought out two astounding facts. Do you know what they are? The first fact is that the serious difficulty for the farmer is the high railroad rates; and that is a Republican measure, put through by a Republican Congress in the Esch-Cummins bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. In my committee we have been conducting for several weeks past hearings as to paragraphs 3 and 4 of section 13 and section 15a for the purpose of reducing rates and giving to the State railway commissions the authority they had before the Esch-Cummins Act was enacted. I want to make this observation, that a banking concern in New York has sent out a letter in which it advised people to buy stock in railroads, for the reason that the administration had given assurance that there will be no change in railroad rates.

Mr. ASWELL. That is very interesting, although very discouraging from the standpoint of the farmers and the average man, but fine for big business and special privilege in control of this administration.

The gentleman from Ohio says the banking system is first class. Of course it is. It is a Democratic creature.

The only time you tried to change it was when you opposed the Democratic plan of adding $50,000,000. The gentleman boasts that they have given $75,000,000 for public roads. The Democratic administration never gave less than $100,000,000 when in power.

But here is an amazing claim that I do not understand. The gentleman from Ohio says, "Our managerial ability is first class." It must be a misprint. He must mean menagerie ability. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio speaks of lower interest rates to the farmer. The rates that the farmers are paying never approached the rates you recommended the other day of 2 per cent for the benefit of big business.

Gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio makes the astounding statement that "The symptoms of the farmer are altogether encouraging," and that "freight rates must come down." Ah, it is a most amazing and amusing situation, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. This proposition of letting the farmer drift, letting the conditions go as they may or may not go, has reached the point where the American people individually know that they are being camouflaged and deceived, and that the party in power is trying to use them for its own promotion and continuance in power.

Let me ask you this question: Would you tax the farmers in your district to give $32,000,000 a year to the private owners of ships and to force now the giving away of the ships owned by this Government? Why, the private owners would get them at a song, and set the tune themselves. Would you be willing to give them a bonus of 10 per cent on the imports of the country, and then permit the railroads to own the ship lines while they now get 6 per cent profit, thereby enabling them to make an average of 8 per cent on the shipping and railroads together?

Gentlemen, the proposition is unthinkable and intolerable.

You ask me, What shall we do? The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the Republican floor leader of the House, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], chairman of the Republican campaign committee, and all your other spellbinders constantly shout that under this Republican administration the industrial, agricultural, and economic conditions of the country are about to begin to improve, that there are signs of the dawning of a better day. Well, with the vigor, the industry, and the genius of the American people, if there can be seen no sign yet of improved conditions, three years after the war, then in Heaven's name when may we hope again to become a happy and prosperous people? Why do your leaders sit here for days whimpering in public with dim-eyed pity for the farmer, saying—I quote from the language of Dr. FESS:

> His symptoms indicate a promising future, and railroad rates must come down—

On the theory, I suppose, that everything that goes up must come down, and therefore railroad rates some time, somewhere, somehow, will come down.

But here are the facts, gentlemen: The farmer does not want or need your maudlin sympathy. He wants available credit at a fair rate of interest and an accessible market, and money in return for the products of his labor. He resents your taxing him and his children to give a subsidy or bonus to the private corporations in the interest of your national campaign fund. He demands a square deal in business; the right to earn a decent and honorable living. He resents your shutting him off from the markets of the country and from the business of the world by oppressive and prohibitive railroad rates, for which a Republican Congress is wholly responsible. If you are sincere, pause a moment.

If you are sincere, why not forthwith force down railroad rates that the farmer may live? Mr. Fechner, of the Federation of Labor, and head of the machinists' union, testified before the Committee on Agriculture the other day that the unemployment situation is worse than it was six months ago. He declared that since the unemployment conference the situation, regardless of reassuring statements from the White House, is growing not better but worse. He declared that 250,000 expert machinists belonged to his union and that more than 100,000 of these expert machinists were now walking the streets seeking work to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. ASWELL. I thank the Chairman.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. About 20 minutes ago the gentleman made the statement that my colleague, Dr. FESS, in his speech had made a great many inaccurate statements. In fact, the gentleman said my colleague misstated the truth.

Mr. ASWELL. I said he told the truth about one thing.

Mr. BEGG. I have listened for 20 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana and I have not heard him disprove a single statement made by my colleague, Dr. FESS. Now, in the rest of his time will the gentleman disprove some of the statements that Dr. FESS made?

Mr. ASWELL. You do not have to disprove a thing that is so patent on its face that everybody knows it.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman does not mean just to call everybody untruthful and not prove it, does he? I think the gentleman owes it to my colleague to prove wherein he misstated anything.

Mr. ASWELL. What do you want me to prove he said?

Mr. BEGG. I want you to prove that anything he said is not true. We all know it is true, and I want you to prove that it is not.

Mr. ASWELL. That depends entirely upon who "we all" are.

Mr. BEGG. That is your own challenge that you laid down, and I think you owe it to this reputable body to prove that my colleague, Dr. FESS, misstated conditions. If you can prove that, he owes it to the Congress to apologize. Otherwise we know that you do not mean what you say.

Mr. ASWELL. I do not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. BEGG. I will say that he can, against this kind of competition.

Mr. ASWELL. Everybody knows that the claims which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] made for this administration were exaggerated and extended and expanded. He claimed that the Congress will appropriate for the 1923 expenses only $1,500,000,000 and that this Government has a balanced budget. Everybody knows these statements are not correct. These misstatements are amply sufficient to condemn his entire political speech. I said he told one exact truth. That was that this administration seeks to delay everything that it talks about, and I can prove that statement to be true. We were told about the ship subsidy bill of $32,000,000, and the next day from the White House the message went out that that would be delayed until after the November election. I do not know by whose authority. All the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said about delay shines out in brilliant truth. But allow me to proceed.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ASWELL. The statements of Mr. Fechner as to unemployment were corroborated by Mr. Wallace, of the Federation of Labor. It is estimated that there are altogether 4,000,000 men out of work. They could earn an average of $5 a day—$20,000,000 a day lost and wasted for lack of work, or $6,000,000,000 wasted by unemployment during the first year of the Harding administration! This is the promised Harding prosperity!

What is the remedy? The remedy is definite, concrete, and clear. If this Republican administration, in complete control of all branches of the Government, would eagerly seek to help the average citizen, freight rates would be at once forced back to normal and the unemployment calamity that has befallen the country by the stupidity of reactionary leaders would be remedied in 30 days. You know well that this is true. How?

First, cease quibbling and dickering for big-business political advantage while truckling to corporate interests, for the fertilizer and the automobile trusts. Turn over Muscle Shoals at once to Henry Ford [applause] who would employ a million men in that one enterprise, to say nothing of the vast wealth he would bring to the country as by a magic hand. It would be ultimately economical for the Government to give Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford rather than to sell it or lease it to other applicants.

Then, find work for the other 3,000,000 idle men in internal improvements. Put millions of money into a sanitary system—invest money and labor to help the citizens keep well. It will pay. It is our duty to do it. Nothing that we can legislate on is more important. Then put an additional million men to work in highway construction, which is the imperative need of this hour.

As I look at the picture to-day, I see 4,000,000 of workers idle. Think of the tragedy! Nothing to do! Breeder of anarchy and bolshevism! They are asking for work, but what are you Republican leaders doing except talking and promising? On the other hand, I see public roads to be built, public buildings in each State, including hospitals for the disabled soldiers, to be erected, great sanitary systems to be constructed, light and power and other far-reaching public utilities to be developed, a million homes to be built, reclamation work to be done, our forests to be preserved, terminal facilities, and rivers and harbors to be improved—all calling for workers—when 4,000,000 workers are idle.

In the face of these plain facts the country is staggered to behold Republican leaders in control talking and jabbering and writing and wondering what to do. There is a plain thing to do. Put the workers and the works together.

The Government should do these things and do them now, because they represent the highest functions of serviceable government. They are the things that concern vitally the general welfare for which governments exist. This is the favorable time to act. The existing economic crisis offers opportunity and demands action.

Let the Republican majority wake up and make haste now to authorize the War Finance Corporation to invest $3,000,000,000, not in throwing credits across the Atlantic but in stopping the loss of six billions a year in unemployment. Utilize this vast sum in stimulating internal improvements of all kinds—sanitation, reclamation, levees, highways, public buildings, public utilities, and waterways. Do this and there will be money in the country. The farmer will have a home market for his products, money for his taxes, and money upon which to operate his business. There is no excuse or defense in this country now for unemployment or for agricultural or industrial depression. The opportunity for relief is here. The remedy is clear. Will the reactionary Republicans in control stand erect and permit us to apply the remedy, or will they wobble on, contenting themselves with vain promises and claims for services not rendered? [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know just how much time it ought to take to answer the political argument that is based on the suggestion that we give Henry Ford Muscle Shoals, and he will put a million men at work on it at once. That is a little like a statement made a little while ago by a man with reference to the German mark. There was complaint made that the German mark was too cheap, and some politician advocated the raising of the price by printing more of them.

I rise for the purpose of giving the committee the benefit of facts concerning the visit of the floor leader of the House to the Agricultural Committee. He was invited to appear before the committee by the majority members of the committee for the reason that we had been holding hearings for several weeks on several important measures, and we wanted to discuss with the floor leader the program for legislation. My genial friend did not hear all of the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming. In the first place, the first bill he discussed was a regulatory bill which the lumber interests advocated, prepared by the lumber interests and introduced at their suggestion, which involved the expenditure of several millions of dollars a year to regulate them in the way that they wanted to be regulated. We had extensive hearings before the committee. The floor leader suggested to the committee that in his judgment it was no time for the American Congress to engage in that expense. I agreed with him. I do not think there will ever come a time when it will be the duty of the American Congress to engage in that expense. Most of the committee that heard the evidence except, perhaps, our friend from Louisiana, expressed the opinion that the other plan advocated in another measure before Congress was the better plan. That plan proposed to make them pay the expenses of their own regulation; that it was better than to take the money out of the Federal Treasury. The floor leader did on that occasion suggest to our committee that on all measures contemplating a large expenditure of public funds we ought to go slow and be careful. [Applause.] I claim that we should take that advice.

I suppose this speech of the gentleman from Louisiana which we just listened to was made for only one purpose. It is patent to anyone that it was made for the purpose of circulating it in the State of Wyoming in the coming election, and I predict that it is such a horrible failure that it never will be used for the purpose for which it was intended. [Applause on the Republican side.] I want to defend any man that stands for right. FRANK MONDELL was floor leader of the House during the last session, when we had a Democratic President and we could not pass agricultural legislation. He told me then as one member of the Agricultural Committee, when we could not procure this legislation, that when we had an administration in sympathy with legislation favorable to the agricultural interests we would pass these measures. Congress convened on April 11, and under his leadership, and being as much responsible for it as any other one man in Congress if not more, we passed many measures, one regulating the packers and the other regulating the grain exchanges, that had been pending in Congress for more than a quarter of a century. They were signed by the President and are now law. Also every stockman in America is a beneficiary by the amendment to the War Finance Corporation act, and I say that no man in the history of the American Congress can claim credit for more legislation friendly to the interests of the farmer than the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] who has been attacked here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You say he stood in this Congress and pleaded against the demagogic amendment making $50,000,000 available for the farm-loan banks when only $25,000,000 was asked for the farm-loan banks. The former chairman of the Agricultural Committee, one of the gentleman's associates [Mr. LEVER], only asked for $25,000,000, and said it was all the money desired by the farm-loan banks and all they needed to function. Was he right? He said that with the revolving fund they could sell the bonds. Was he right? They offered $75,000,000 in bonds for sale, and while they thought it would take weeks they sold them in two days. This Congress stands ready to appropriate $100,000,000 if needed, but not one dime to be demagogic and try to fool somebody.

I do not know how you can condemn Mr. MONDELL for that attitude, when every one on the Democratic side of the aisle knows that Frank Lever was on the square when he asked for only $25,000,000.

My friend says that the legislation that we have passed has not benefited the farmer. Ask the farmer. I challenge any man to say that it is not a fact that every day since the packer regulation act went into effect that every stockman on the market will tell you that conditions have improved. I challenge any man to cite me a farmer who will say that there has been a single day since the grain futures act went into effect on the 24th of December when the condition of the producers of grain in this country have not improved. Oh, I suppose my genial friend, when separated from his Chautauqua duties, will question that—and, by the way, I was reminded this morning of the first time I ever had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman. I remembered him by that whisper. The gentleman was a Member of this body. During all those years why did you not pass some of those laws? I say that this Congress will go down in history as having been the hardest-working and most effective Congress this country has ever had.

The gentleman says that conditions are bad. They are. But who made them bad? When this Congress assembled on the 11th of April, 1921, what was the economic condition of this country? Could it have been worse? Is there any way to draw a picture of a worse condition? No one representing a majority in this Congress has ever predicted to the American people that a magic wand might be waved that will save them. You get that kind of a story from speeches like the one we just listened to, where war prices are compared with peace prices, and then some political party blamed for it.

FRANK MONDELL was invited before our committee. He came before it, and while he might have gone a little further in his economy advice and advised against spending every dollar that every member of the committee wanted to spend, yet I challenge my friend to find another member of that committee, Democrat or Republican, who will question the soundness, the propriety, and the honest intention of Mr. MONDELL in being for America in his advice to the committee. [Applause on the Republican side.] He did say that there was a constitutional question with reference to price fixing in peace times, and there is. I invited the advocates of the bill to fix prices on all products to come before the committee and show us wherein under the Constitution we can enact such legislation. I wonder if my friend, in reading that part of his speech applying to Mr. MONDELL, meant to be categoried with those that favor the extensive price-fixing program which is advocated by some before our committee, and I now yield time to my friend to declare himself on the proposition of price fixing, as advocated by those measures.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose or desire or intention to make any report to the gentleman from Kansas on this or any other subject.

Mr. TINCHER. I did not know. I thought, perhaps, because he had criticized Mr. MONDELL for wondering about the constitutionality of such proposed legislation, that he had some fixed ideas upon it. I still persist, though I may be wrong, that that speech will never be used in Wyoming for what it was intended for. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 mintues to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, before I begin to discuss the subject I wish to bring to the attention of the House I want to answer one or two statements made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] who just left the floor. He made the statement here just now that Frank Lever asked for only $25,000,000 at the hands of this Congress because he thought that was enough to meet the demands of the farmers. That is not the reason. The reason that Mr. Lever never insisted on more than $25,000,000 when that bill was before the Congress was because he knew very well that he could not get any more at the hands of the Banking and Currency Committee, because of orders from Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury. I notice the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] is leaving the Hall. He knows that I know more about it than he does, because I was on that committee. In addition to this I wish to answer his talk about this little appropriation being sufficient to satisfy the farmers of the country. It is all poppy-cock to make such a contention. The Senate passed an amendment to one of the appropriation bills authorizing a loan to the farmers through the Federal Farm Loan Board of $100,000,000, and the Banking and Currency Committee of this House refused to agree to the amendment, and subsequently, when the Democrats made an effort to restore the Senate amendment to the bill, this House voted it down and let the amount stand at $25,000,000, as agreed upon by the committee. The western Members agreed to the small amount simply for the reason that Mr. Mellon and others had arranged for a private loan with bankers in the North and East amounting to $50,000,000 for the western farmers. Mr. Lever did not ask for any more at the hands of our committee because he knew he could not get any more, as we Democratic members from the South did not have the backing of the western members of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I want to say to my friend that when that bill was being considered before the Banking and Currency Committee Mr. Lever did state that $25,000,000 was all they needed.

Mr. BRAND. I was there when Mr. Lever appeared before our committee.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is right out here in the Hall of the House.

Mr. BRAND. I mean in the committee.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Lever and Charlie Lobdell were together, and they agreed on $25,000,000.

Mr. BRAND. Of course, Mr. Lobdell would agree to this amount, because, according to my information, though a splendid man and in sympathy with the farmers, he never has been in favor of the Federal farm loan system.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Frank Lever was in favor of it, was he not, and he agreed to $25,000,000?

Mr. BRAND. He did not.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I say that he did agree to it in the conference which finally determined the form of the bill.

Mr. BRAND. Not in the committee room.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Georgia will permit, the gentleman from Kansas is not talking about what happened before the Banking and Currency Committee in the House. He is talking about what happened in conferences between certain members of the Farm Loan Board and the steering committee of the House.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STEAGALL. The steering committee had before it at the time a bill providing for $50,000,000 of aid. It had been reported by the committee, and the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee had been asked to get a rule for the consideration of that measure.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BRAND. When I finish with the speech which I want to deliver, I will yield to the gentleman, because I am very fond of him, and I shall be glad to argue this thing out with him right here.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What is that?

Mr. BRAND. I say I am very fond of the gentleman from Kansas, and I will argue it out——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I would just like——

Mr. BRAND. Let me get through with my speech first. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of Congress to a matter of the utmost importance which is in no sense political or partisan. While the Senate is investigating the eligibility of Senator SMOOT and Representative BURTON to act as members of the refunding commission, I think it advisable that they include in this investigation the qualifications and eligibility of Secretary Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury to act upon this commission. The question involved is one in which every taxpayer of the United States is interested. It is world-wide known fact that certain European nations owe the United States about $11,000,000,000. It is generally known also that they owe a group of international bankers about $5,000,000,000. The taxpayers of the United States are becoming intensely interested in the collection of the debts due them. This group of international bankers are bent on having their money and are interested in collecting it whether the United States ever collects a dollar or not. Here are two classes of creditors with claims against a common debtor which is generally reputed to be bankrupt. Their interests are in conflict and are adverse. Therefore it becomes a very important matter to know whether or not Mr. Mellon is the owner of any of these obligations due these private bankers or whether any of his kinfolks within the prohibited degree are the owners of them, or whether any of the great banking and financial institutions to which he belongs are the owners of any of them or are interested in any of these debts.

These debts can not be collected by law, as everybody knows. The only way if the debtors refuse to pay them is to collect them by war. The question which I raise, and I do it in all seriousness, Is Mr. Mellon disqualified to act on the Refunding Commission by reason of interest? The answer to this inquiry depends upon the question whether Mr. Mellon owns any of these obligations that are due these private bankers, or whether any of his kinfolks within the prohibited degree do, or whether any of the great banking and business institutions of which he is a director and stockholder and to which I shall call attention in a few moments, own any of them. If he owns any of these obligations, or is financially interested in their collection, he is disqualified by every rule of law known laid down by any law writer from acting on this commission.

A short time ago, and when the refunding bill was on its passage, Senator WATSON of Georgia called the Senate's attention to a statute passed in 1789 at the first session of the American Congress. I do not believe there are a half dozen men either in the House or Senate who knew such a law was in existence until Senator WATSON called the Senate's attention to it. This statute is now a part of the Revised Statutes of the United States, second edition of 1878, and I will incorporate it as part of my remarks. The substance of it is that the Secretary of the Treasury is disqualified from acting in this capacity if he is engaged in the business of trade or commerce or if he owns any State or national securities. The point made by Senator WATSON is different from the one I am making. This act reads as follows:

SEC. 243. No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or First Comptroller, or First Auditor, or Treasurer, or Register, shall, directly or indirectly, be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, or another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use any emolument or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the Treasury Department, other than what shall be allowed by law; and every person who offends against any of the prohibitions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall, upon conviction, be removed from office and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States; and if any other person than a public prosecutor shall give information of any such offense, upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had, one-half the aforesaid penalty of $3,000, when recovered, shall be for the use of the person giving such information.

The validity of this statute was brought into question, as shown by Senator WATSON, when President Grant appointed A. T. Stewart, then the king merchant of this country, to be Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate had confirmed Mr. Stewart and he had qualified before this statute was called to the attention of the President. After it was discovered it appears, Senator WATSON quoting from Mr. Blaine's "Twenty Years in Congress," that an effort was made, led by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, to repeal so much of this act as applied to the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Sumner objected. The Senate failing to come to his rescue, Mr. Stewart resigned and Hon. George S. Boutwell was nominated and confirmed as Secretary of the Treasury. Senator WATSON contended under the terms of this act that Mr. Mellon, being engaged in the business of trade and commerce, is disqualified from acting as Secretary of the Treasury and that he is violating the law every day he holds this office, for which he could be arrested and convicted.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. I will yield, but I have not much time.

Mr. LONDON. For just a short question. Does not the same principle apply to a legislator, to a Member of the House or of the Senate, who legislates on matters directly affecting his personal interest?

Mr. BRAND. It does.

Mr. LONDON. But we have no prohibition, however, either in present morals or present law against it.

Mr. BRAND. Yes; we have ample law which disqualifies anybody in interest from serving in any capacity where his interests are involved.

Mr. CRISP. But if the gentleman will permit, the rules of this House expressly provide that a Member can not vote on any question in which he is personally interested.

Mr. LONDON. And that would prevent a man engaged in industry from voting for a protective tariff; that would prevent a banker from voting on any matter affecting the financial interests; that would prevent a Member from exercising the right to legislate.

Mr. BRAND. The gentleman speaks very often and well, but as my time is limited I can not yield further.

Mr. LONDON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BRAND. The contention of Senator WATSON is confined to the disqualification of Secretary Mellon under this act of Congress. My contention is, Mr. Mellon is disqualified to act as a member of the Refunding Commission on account of interest, if he is the owner of any of the obligations due these private bankers, or if any of the business and banking institutions in which he is a director or stockholder are the owners thereof, or if he has any kinspeople who own any of these obligations, who are related to Mr. Mellon within the prohibited degree.

This question Mr. Mellon can decide for and answer to the country himself without an investigation, if he chooses to do so. If he will not do so, then the investigation ought to be had to determine whether he is interested as I have indicated. If he is not disqualified from interest, it is easy for him to say so. If he is disqualified, he ought not to serve on this commission, because every intelligent man knows that the interest of the taxpayers of the United States and the interest of the international bankers who own these obligations against the same debtors is adverse.

Subsequently Senator WATSON again brought this matter before the Senate, at which time he inserted in the RECORD an article from Current Opinion, which shows Mr. Mellon's business connections in the United States. The editorial is entitled a "Rival of Rockefeller is Secretary of the Treasury." Says the author:

The record of the personal activities of Secretary Mellon includes 4 banks, of one of which he recently resigned the presidency to enter the Cabinet, 4 insurance companies, 7 educational and philanthropic institutions, and 62 other corporations. Their products—oil, aluminum, railway cars, locomotives, steel, plate glass, radiators, carborundum, bolts and rivets, motor trucks, and a hundred other things—go all over the world. The Mellon National Bank, of Pittsburgh, has resources of $132,000,000 and deposits aggregating $105,000,000. The concerns in which he was actively interested prior to March 4 have resources in excess of $800,000,000.

Senator REED, in discussing the question of Mr. Mellon's business connections, identifies among these 62 corporations in which Mr. Mellon is a stockholder the following:

The Mellon National Bank, the Pittsburgh Coal Co., the Union Trust Co.

The Aluminum Co. of America; capitalization, $20,000,000; controlling five companies with a combined capital of $20,000,000.

The American Locomotive Co.; capital, $50,000,000.

The American Metal Co., a holding company, $25,000,000 capital, which controls 12 companies with combined capitalization of $8,000,000.

The Baltimore Car & Foundry Co., $1,500,000.

The Carborundum Co., $2,500,000.

The Gulf Oil Corporation, $60,000,000, which controls nine companies with a combined capitalization of $24,000,000.

This makes a total capitalization of $210,000,000.

Banks and trust companies, $33,500,000. Total capitalization, $243,500,000.

National Bank of Commerce of New York; capitalization, $25,000,000; surplus, $25,000,000; deposits, $363,000,000. Mellon National Bank; capitalization, $6,000,000; surplus, $5,000,000; deposits, $102,000,000. Union Savings Bank; capitalization, $1,000,000; surplus, $1,000,000; deposits, $20,000,000. Union Trust Co.; capitalization, $1,500,000; surplus, $35,000,000; deposits, $100,000,000.

Pennsylvania Railroad Co., of which prior to January, 1921, he was a director, with a total capital of $440,000,000. Grand total capitalization, $683,500,000.

I summon Mr. Mellon to the witness stand and ask him if he or any of these great moneyed institutions own or have any interest in the debts due these private bankers.

It must not be forgotten that when this question of refunding the allied debt was first raised it was contended by the administration, if not by Mr. Mellon himself, that he should be given entire control of refunding the $11,000,000,000 due the United States by the European debtors. The Senate very properly refused consent to this, and instead of giving him full control over the matter it was provided that a commission be appointed to have jurisdiction of this question, of which the Secretary of the Treasury should be a member.

Congress should have gone further and provided that no final action could be taken by the commission without first obtaining the approval of the Congress, which Congress refused to do.

The truth is, some of these international bankers want the debts due the United States canceled, knowing, if this is done, that it will make their debts against the European nations worth a hundred cents on the dollar. Those who do not come out squarely for cancellation of these debts are intensely interested in having the United States agree to a long-time postponement of the collection of its loans. Mr. Mellon believes in this. The minute this is done, and it is going to be done, the debts of the private bankers will increase in value and every dollar of the same will be collected before the United States collects a dollar of its principal debt. It will be remembered when this question was first raised Mr. Mellon himself wanted to have entire control of this refunding proposition. The administration wanted him to take entire control of it. If he had entire control of it he could regulate the rate of interest, when payments should be made, and how long a time they should be postponed. He wanted it all in his own hands.

In submitting this question I do not for a minute impugn the honesty and integrity of Mr. Mellon. His life and character as a private citizen and as a public man, from what I have read of him, seem to be above reproach; and yet, being moved by self-interest, as all humanity is, he can not disassociate himself from Mr. Mellon as an owner or an interested party in these private debts and Mr. Mellon as a representative of the United States Government. As such owner or interested party his interests first, last, and all the time will be to collect his debts first. This is natural. Self-interest has been from the beginning of time and will be until the end of the human family the first concern of all men. In The Last of the Barons a colloquy is recorded in regard to the purpose of King Edward, who was trying to increase his power abroad and to repair what he has lost in the eyes of Europe, through his marriage with Elizabeth Grey, by allying his sister Margaret with the brother of Louis XI, when one of Bulwer's characters said:

> He was not overpleased with this French marriage making, and asked: "What will become of our trade with Flanders—answer me that, Master Stokton? The House of York is a good house, and the king is a good king, but trade is trade. Every man must draw water to his own mill.

Every State of the Union has enacted statutes providing for the disqualification from interest from the humblest officer in the smallest division of the State to the judge of the highest court.

There is not a court of last resort who would not hold, if Mr. Mellon is interested as indicated and the issue is properly presented, that he is disqualified.

There is not a judge on earth who would not rule that a juror who was thus interested in a case was disqualified.

There is not a judge of any important court in this Republic if thus interested in a case pending before him who would not disqualify himself.

The President would not appoint Senator SMOOT if he owned or was interested in any of these private obligations. He would not appoint Mr. BURTON if he was likewise interested.

I do not believe he would knowingly appoint Mr. Mellon as a member of this commission if he knew he owned or is interested in any of these private obligations.

There is no rule of law laid down in any law book which has ever been written which would authorize Mr. Mellon to be a qualified member of this commission if he is interested as I have indicated, with one exception, and that is the one known to the law as the "rule of necessity."

If the President could not get anyone else in the country to act who was qualified under the law, then under the "rule of necessity" the President would be authorized to appoint Mr. Mellon.

For instance, when a member of the Supreme Court of the United States has any interest in a case or any of his kinfolks within the prohibited degree have any interest, he declines to preside. In an extreme case there might come before this court a case where all the members of the court were disqualified from interest or otherwise, in which event, there being no law to appoint a judge pro hac vice for this court, there would be no qualified court to try the case. Then under the "rule of necessity" the members of the court could preside, notwithstanding their disqualification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BRAND. In the Senate a short time ago Senator BORAH, in discussing this question, said:

> Mr. President, I was going to say that in a conversation a few days ago with a gentleman, perhaps well known to all Members of the Senate, a man of national reputation, whose name possibly I am not privileged to use in public discussion, a man who has just returned from a four months' stay in Europe, he said the only place he knows of where the payment of this debt is still discussed is in the United States; that in the chancelleries of Europe, among the bankers of Europe, among the business men of Europe, among the economists of Europe, it is considered that the debt will never be paid, and that it is simply a question of postponing the settlement until, as they say, the public mind of America will accede to the wisdom of canceling the debts.

I concur in this view, because I do not believe there is a man in this House who will live to see any part of the principal of these debts paid.

If section 243 disqualifies Mr. Mellon from acting as Secretary of the Treasury—and from this conclusion there seems to be no escape, and there certainly has been no answer to this point raised by Senator WATSON—then he can not act on this commission. If this statute is to be ignored and treated as a dead letter, then, I insist in all seriousness and fairness, an investigation ought to be had to determine whether Mr. Mellon is disqualified from acting as a member of said commission from interest, because it is manifest in his case that the "rule of necessity" can not be invoked.

If anything is willfully done or left undone by those who may be charged with the collection of the loans which this country made to the European nations whereby these loans are not collected or the payment of the same is indefinitely postponed, those who are parties to this calamity will go to their graves disgraced and dishonored and with the scorn and curses of their fellow countrymen, and history will brand their memory with the mark of eternal infamy. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I want to say that my friend [Mr. STEAGALL] is very much mistaken. The fact is that Mr. Lever and Mr. Lobdell never had any meeting with any member of the steering committee. We disagreed in the Committee on Banking and Currency as to how much money was necessary to deposit with farm loan banks to make them function. Mr. Lever and Mr. Lobdell, as members of the Farm Loan Board, were sent for, and they agreed in my presence that $25,000,000 was all they needed. And we appropriated that amount and the system has functioned.

Mr. BRAND. The thing had been fixed before they ever saw you.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to bear testimony in this matter. Both Mr. Lever, for whom I have a high regard——

Mr. BRAND. I have, too.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And Mr. Lobdell came to my office and without any persuasion on my part told me that the sum of $25,000,000 would meet the situation and care for it and provide all that was necessary. And that their judgment was sound has been proven by the facts.

Mr. BRAND. The people of my district have been trying for nine months to get what they need and applied for from this sluggish Federal Farm Loan Board here in Washington and the bank at Columbia, S. C., in order to save themselves from bankruptcy. It is silly to claim that this system as operated has been equal to the emergency. In one county of my district there were advertised for sale last month 35 farms for State and county taxes. The bank at Columbia claims it has not had enough money to supply the demands. This bank went so far as to notify some of the loan associations not to make any more applications for loans. And yet we are told that $25,000,000 was all the country needed. This statement is not true. We not only need more money, but we need to vitalize, if not revolutionize, the present operations and activities of the system, particularly of the bank at Columbia, so that, whatever may be the cause or whoever may be guilty of negligence, there may be an end to the inexcusable and intolerable delay in granting loans. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, criticism, ever alive, is always more active in periods of depression. When we have not got anything else to do we busy ourselves by criticizing. Much criticism is heard now throughout the land, and some of it is not founded, certainly, upon fact.

I wish briefly to advert to the criticism that we hear that not enough has been done or is being done for the soldiers of the World War. I wish to invite the attention of the committee for a few moments to some of the facts of history in order that we may make comparisons, because it is only by comparison that we can have intelligent thought as to what has been done and is being done by the Congress of the United States for the World War veterans, all of whom we respect and all of whom we desire to honor.

It was two years after the close of the Civil War before a single dollar was voted by the Congress for the benefit of the survivors of the Civil War. It was 25 years after the close of the Civil War before a pension in excess of $8 per month was granted to a survivor. To-day the minimum compensation received by a soldier of the World War is equal to what the maximum was for 25 years to the soldier of the Civil War, and after 60 years the greatest amount that a soldier of the Civil War can receive is $50, unless he establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that he is totally disabled, and then he may receive a pension of $72 per month. On the other hand, the maximum that we are to-day paying the soldier of the World War is $157 per month.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I can not yield.

The Spanish-American War veterans for 20 years after the close of the Spanish-American War were allowed only $30 per month for commissioned officers of the rank of lieutenant colonel and higher rank who were totally disabled, and $8 per month for noncommissioned officers and privates who were totally disabled. Spanish-American War veterans are now limited to a maximum of $30 per month and a minimum of $12 per month, depending upon the degree of disability.

It may be interesting to call the attention of the committee to the amount of money that the American Congress since the beginning of our Government has appropriated as pensions and compensations:

Table showing total amounts paid to soldiers of the various wars in which the United States has been engaged from 1790–1917.

Revolutionary War	$70,000,000
War of 1812	46,094,572
Indian wars	20,017,919
Mexican War	54,471,001
Civil War	5,749,030,456
War with Spain and Philippine insurrection	76,000,000

It is well also to take into consideration, when we are comparing and contrasting the amount that has been paid by the American Government to her protectors, what we have paid in comparison with what other Governments are paying, and for that purpose I have compiled the figures showing what our allies have done in this war, as follows:

Rates of pay for enlisted men.	Per month.
Great Britain	$11.40
France	1.50
Japan	1.78
Italy	1.58
United States (if overseas, $33 per month)	30.00

Comparative table of annual pensions of allied countries in comparison with compensation paid by United States, per annum.

TOTAL PERMANENT DISABILITY (MAN ALONE).

Great Britain		£104
(Value in United States dollars, $376.48.)
Canada		$600
(Value in United States dollars, $540.)
France	francs	4,000
(Value in United States dollars, $314.)
Italy	lire	1,260
(Value in United States dollars, $55.44.)
United States		$1,200

N. B.—In addition to compensation benefits above referred to, the United States also pays insurance. If ex-soldier becomes permanently and totally disabled, this policy matures and he receives such payments in addition to payments of compensation.

The allowances of various countries for the benefit of families of soldiers when they were in the war were these:

Allowances by the various Governments for benefit of families of soldiers while they were absent in the military or naval service.

	Per annum.
France	$50.14
Great Britain	202.36
Italy	11.24
United States	360.00

The assumed liability of the Government by reason of insurance awards amounts to $860,154,495.65 in addition to amounts already paid.

The assumed liability of the Government by reason of the insurance awards amounts to $860,154,495.65, in addition to these amounts to which I have called attention.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield right there for one short question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Make it very brief. I have not much time.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I think it is very important, and I should like to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that a great many of these figures which he has presented are for insurance paid out, for which the men have paid.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I gave those figures, and it is a very easy matter to make the computation.

Mr. LINEBERGER. The gentleman has made no observation to that effect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, perhaps I may before I get through.

Mr. LINEBERGER. The gentleman is disinclined to yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My time is very short. The United States has spent $1,567,336,790.52 for benefits for ex-service men and women; also $256,239,900 for the $60 bonus given each man on his discharge from the service. Also it has assumed a definite liability as concerns insurance awards for death and disability, exclusive of premiums received from soldiers and sailors, of $860,154,495.65.

The Government has spent and definitely obligated itself to date for ex-service men and women the sum of $2,683,731,186.17. Or in other words we have appropriated and obligated ourselves for the benefit of the survivors of the World War and their dependents an amount equal to one-half of what we have appropriated in 60 years to the survivors of the Civil War, and there were more than half as many engaged in the Civil War as were engaged in the World War.

I also want to call attention to some comparative statements showing the annual pensions allowed by different countries.

In Great Britain the total amount allowed for permanent disability is $376.48 per year; in Canada, $540; in France, $314; in Italy, $55; and in the United States, $1,200.

In addition to the compensation and benefits above referred to the United States also pays insurance. If the ex-soldier becomes permanently and totally disabled his policy matures and he receives that payment in addition to his other payments and compensations.

The United States has approved for vocational training 303,276 applications, and 104,923 are still in training. The minister of labor states that England under the labor ministry's scheme has approved 58,000 ex-service men for training and that 24,000 are still in training.

The United States has spent as much as both France and Great Britain combined for benefits in favor of ex-service men, despite the fact that the casualties of France and Great Britain were fifteen times greater than those of the United States. The English casualties were 1,400,000, with 9,000,000 men engaged. The French casualties were 1,800,000, with 9,500,000 men engaged. The United States casualties were 205,000, with 2,085,000 men engaged in warfare upon the other side of the sea. There were 4,000,000 men enrolled, but only 2,085,000 were at the front.

I have felt, in view of the criticism that is being made and continually made that the Congress of the United States is not doing what it should do for the survivors of the World War, that it was only due to the committee and due to the country that these figures be presented and these comparisons made.

Never since the beginning of time has there been a republic more grateful to its defenders than the United States, and I hope the time will never come when the doors of the United States Treasury will be closed against the afflicted soldier, against the wounded soldier, and against those who are dependent upon them. I know that it is the duty and the desire of the generous-hearted American people that the utmost care be given to those who are in need by reason of the sacrifice made upon the altar of their country, but I do think it comes with bad grace for anyone, without knowing the facts, to criticize the American Congress and the American people as being niggardly in the treatment of those who served them on the battle front. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, three and seventy years ago to-day there was born in the State of Kentucky a man child who became one of the glories of his generation. One year ago to-day all that was mortal of him was entombed in his beloved adopted State of Missouri. The record of his life was fresh in the memories of all of us who are here assembled, and even his personal presence is vivid in the recollection of practically every person who sits within the sound of my voice. In view of the eminent position which he occupied in the country, and particularly in this House, and in view of the affection and esteem in which he was held by all of those who are now listening to me, I trust there may be thought to be nothing inappropriate in expressing a fond and tender recollection of our beloved friend and statesman, the Hon. Champ Clark. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I shall make I do not intend to reflect upon the members of the Farm Loan Board, because from what I know of this board as now constituted the services they have rendered in other fields of public endeavor entitle them to fair and courteous treatment at our hands. One of the distinguished gentlemen on the board is a friend of mine, and in recent years no one who has served in this House is held in higher esteem by the membership of this body than he. But the farming industry of this country is in a deplorable condition, as we all know, and I want to do something, if I can, to help relieve the financial distress among the people in my State.

The Congress in recent years has been responsive to the needs of agriculture, and in 1916, under a Democratic administration, there was passed a law known as the Federal farm loan act that established a firm basis for the development of agriculture. If this law is administered according to the intentions and purposes of the act it will prove most helpful and beneficial in meeting the financial needs of a great many of our citizens who, unless they get relief from this agency of the Government, are desperately, and I might say hopelessly, involved. There is no need for me to tell you that the situation is serious. Reports from the daily press would seem to indicate that business in certain lines is on the upgrade, but I can speak from an intimate and painful knowledge of conditions as they exist in my part of the country, and I declare to you that they are distressing beyond exaggeration. Pick up almost any newspaper published in Georgia and you will see farms upon farms advertised by the sheriff to sell at public auction for the payment of State and county taxes, and this has been going on for months and months. These people have land, live stock, farming implements, and almost anything else but the ready cash, and they can not get that. Some may ask, "Why do they not go to the banks and private money lenders and borrow from them?" The reply is the banks have no money, and what money the private lender had was loaned out long ago, and he can not get it back. That is the situation in Georgia, and my information is that practically the same conditions exist in other Southern and Western States. Upon investigation, I have ascertained that there have been 87 State bank failures, or suspensions, in Georgia since October, 1920, and they are still closing their doors. I am actually ashamed to say how many such failures have occurred in my own district during this dreadful period of depression. And not only banks have failed, but cotton factors, merchants, farmers, machinists, individuals, and so forth, and the bankruptcy courts are doing more business than they have ever done.

We think that the rapid deflation of our national currency was largely caused by the action of the Federal Reserve Board, and this brought about a great shrinkage in the value of all farm products; therefore we feel that we are justified in coming to another agency of the Government, the Farm Loan Board, for assistance.

The Federal farm loan act is an act "to provide for agricultural development." It says:

> No loan shall be made to any person who is not at the time engaged in the cultivation of the farm or shortly to become engaged in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged.

It is clearly the purpose of the act to afford assistance to all those who comply with this simple requirement. In pursuance of the provisions of this act there have been established in different parts of the United States 12 farm land banks; and I cheerfully admit that these banks have given timely assistance to a number of persons who were fortunate enough to have their application for a loan approved. But where one person secures a loan a half dozen, perhaps, are turned down. These people are not asking charity of the Federal Treasury. They are only asking fair and equitable treatment at the hands of the Government they are helping to support.

In this connection, if you will permit, I will read an utterance made by a former Secretary of the United States Treasury. He says:

> The American farmer is not a pauper seeking alms. Neither is he a ward of the Government, to be treated as an irresponsible child.
> Up to the time of the passage of the farm loan act the system of farming credits in operation in this country was exceedingly cumbersome. It was so cumbersome that it would not furnish the kind of service the farmer required at any price; that is, it could not furnish loans on the long-term amortization plan. Also, the entire field of farm credits was without anything more than the most primitive, and therefore futile, regulations as to rates of interest and commission charges.
> After an exhaustive study of the needs of the country, and after another exhaustive study of the credit system of the European countries, Congress decided to adequately finance agriculture as a great underlying industry essential to the life of the Nation.
> Congress did not contemplate any petty remedy. It did not contemplate charity for the small farmer. It did not contemplate a special privilege for the big farmer.
> But Congress did contemplate establishing a practical system of rural credits by which the farmer would be enabled to secure as a right—not as a favor—adequate funds at reasonable rates.

I will quote briefly from a speech made in the Senate February 3, 1922, by Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, of Florida, who, I understand, originated the scheme or plan embodied in the act I have been discussing. On that occasion the distinguished Senator spoke as follows:

> The system was intended as a system of farm finance, based upon the cooperative principle, to be controlled by the farmers, managed by them, and independent of private capital and independent of political influence.
> Conclusive evidence has come to me to the effect that although the needs of the farmers of the country have never been as great as they are to-day for the use of the facilities provided by this act they have been denied the benefits which they were entitled to have and should have had if the act had been allowed its proper scope and function and operation.

A ready and plausible excuse can always be given by those selected to administer the law when they are called upon to give a reason why a certain application for a loan has been denied. To illustrate, the Farm Loan Board have been contending and still contend that sufficient funds are not available to accommodate all those who applied for loans, and for that reason they separated the borrowers into three classes. First, the farmer who lives on his farm and is engaged in no other occupation except cultivating the soil; second, the farmer who lives in a town or city, but is engaged exclusively in agriculture; and, third, a person while engaged in agriculture is engaged in other business enterprises in addition to that of farming. Those in the first class have been given preference in passing upon application for loans, and I can find no objection to this arrangement. But I want these farm land banks to accommodate every farmer who can furnish the security for a loan and comply with the provisions of the law. And that is the purpose of the farm loan act. It was not intended that these banks should single out a person here and there for a loan and turn the rest down because funds are not available. In the United States there are 6,449,242 farms. Of these, 3,924,851 are operated by the owners, 68,512 by managers, and 2,455,879 by tenants. The value of these farms, as shown by the last census, is a little over $54,000,000,000, and the value of the improvements thereon is over $11,000,000,000, making a total value of farms, with improvements, of over $65,000,000,000. It has been nearly six years since the farm loan act was passed and yet there has been loaned to the farmers of the whole country only $573,666,713—a mere pittance, a drop in the bucket compared to the actual needs and the value of the security they have to offer.

Under the act the money which is loaned to farmers is obtained by the sale of farm-loan bonds, which are issued upon the authority of the Federal Farm Loan Board, who are clothed with wide discretion and broad powers in issuing them. One trouble in administering the law has been the timidity, you might say, of the members of this board in offering these bonds to the investing public for fear they would not be readily absorbed. And the members of this board have given that as a reason why loans have not been made in greater numbers to the farmers throughout the country. Only a few days ago, I understand, this Farm Loan Board, with some degree of trepidation, had issued and put upon the market $70,000,000 worth of bonds, and they were subscribed for in less than two days. I am trying to impress upon the Members of this House and upon the country that it is the solemn duty of this board, clothed with such broad discretion and almost unlimited powers, to exercise that discretion less grudgingly, and to have and to hold available at all times the funds necessary to supply the needs of the people this law was intended to benefit. Every day's delay puts out of business some good farmer who ought to be helped, and this is no time to procrastinate and experiment with this legislation. The law has ample safeguards to protect the Government, and I say let the Farm Loan Board sell enough bonds to take care of all the applications that ought to be approved, and in this way they will effectually administer an act of Congress that was made to serve a good purpose in a time of great need. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not true that if the bonds were issued to supply the market and the demands of all the landowners, that would help to increase the supply of a circulating medium, and indirectly in that way also lead to an added price of commodities?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It would greatly increase the supply of a circulating medium, because they would lend the money out to the farmers and that would materially help the circulation.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That would again inure to the benefit of those who have things to sell, to the farmer, and thereby tend to elevate the market price and thus relieve the stagnation to some extent.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think that would furnish considerable relief. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I have asked for a few minutes to address the House at this time on a question which I believe of great national importance to the people of our country. The newspapers of Monday, February 27, published articles relative to the action taken by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor in attacking the Volstead law and calling upon the voters of the country to support only such candidates for Congress who would pledge themselves to the modification of the prohibition enforcement law in such a way as would permit the manufacture and sale of wine and beer.

Upon this question the statement of the American Federation of Labor council is as follows:

> We urge, therefore, that all citizens in every walk of life demand from their Representatives and Senators in Washington immediate relief from the restrictions contained in the Volstead Act, bearing in mind their attitude toward this issue in the coming election in order that there may be restored to the people light wines and beer.

INTERESTED IN LABOR LEGISLATION.

I have taken a great interest in the activities and efforts of the American Federation of Labor on behalf of the working people of the country, and while I have not at all times supported their views on legislation, yet I believe that my record in Congress will show that I have tried to be fair upon all legislation for the benefit of those who labor.

As one who has been a member of a labor organization for the past 20 years I can not subscribe to the action of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor in asking for the modification of the Volstead Act in order to permit the sale of wine and beer, and I believe that my attitude will be approved by a very large proportion of the men and women who are affiliated with the labor organizations of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I wish briefly to take up point by point the reasons given by the council of the American Federation of Labor in demanding the manufacture and sale of beer and wine. The council's action is based on the following claims:

1. A GENERAL DISREGARD OF THE LAW AMONG ALL CLASSES OF PEOPLE, INCLUDING THOSE WHO MADE THE LAW.

In answer to statement No. 1, I reply by saying that prohibition has not made liquor dealers lawless. They have always been lawbreakers. They started the whisky rebellion in 1794, and have been in rebellion against the Government ever since. The statement that those who made the law have great disregard for it is not borne out when we remember that recently both Congress and State legislatures have strengthened the prohibition law. Those who opposed prohibition in and out of Congress have for the most part kept up their fight against it.

2. CREATION OF THOUSANDS OF MOONSHINERS AMONG BOTH COUNTRY AND CITY DWELLERS.

Of course, everyone knows the moonshiner was on the job before prohibition. When the first revenue laws were enacted the moonshine business throve in order to furnish liquor without paying the tax and that the makers might make an easy living out of the liquor business. The increased value of whisky now may induce an increased number to engage in the hazardous business. If we are to repeal a law, however, because some people break it, every law on the statute books will be repealed. It must be remembered also that many of these moonshiners are criminals of other classes and transferred their efforts to this line because it proved more profitable.

3. THE CREATION OF AN ARMY OF BOOTLEGGERS.

Mr. Chairman, the bootleggers and the moonshiners are not as a rule creations from heretofore law-abiding citizens. They are former liquor dealers or criminals in some other line of activity. The reason why the bootlegger is so conspicuous is that selling liquor is a crime. When we had the licensed saloons statistics show that in many States there were more illicit dealers than in the same States after they voted for prohibition. The illicit dealer under license was not fought aggressively by the temperance people, because his suppression only meant more sale for the regular dealers. The regular dealer was afraid to oppose him because he feared the outlaw would retaliate on him. Nearly every one of the liquor dealers violated some regulative law.

4. AN AMAZING INCREASE IN THE TRAFFIC IN POISONS AND DEADLY CONCOCTIONS AND DRUGS.

Investigations show there is no evidence that there is an increase in the use of drugs due to the prohibition of liquor. Prohibition has not increased narcotic-drug consumption, is the verdict of the narcotic officials who were asked by Commissioner Haynes to investigate the subject, and in this they are corroborated by Miss Rose Rosenberg, woman district attorney of New York, who recently declared:

> Since prohibition there is a great decrease in the number of women appearing in the police courts. Less of them spend their evenings in barrooms or drug joints. Even some of the hardened women are dropping from the notice of the police, and we attribute this to the difficulty in obtaining both liquor and drugs.

Dr. Doane, of the Philadelphia General Hospital, is reported to have said:

> I have made a point of asking all drug patients if lack of alcohol has turned them to drugs, but have yet to find such the case. I can say positively there has been no increase in the use of drugs since prohibition.
> Alcoholic drinkers have not become drug addicts—

Is the testimony of William L. Woodward of a large Portland, Oreg., drug concern.

Commissioner Haynes says:

> Our experience clearly indicates that those who sought alcoholic stimulants do not turn to drugs.
> It has not been proven there is any connection between the dope habit and alcohol, nor has the eighteenth amendment caused an increase of addicts.

5. AN INCREASED RATE OF INSANITY, BLINDNESS, AND CRIME AMONG THE USERS OF THESE CONCOCTIONS AND DRUGS.

Of course, there is much blindness and probably some insanity caused by drinking bootleg whisky and denatured alcohol. The number of deaths from alcohol in most places has not increased in spite of the death of the unfortunate victims of wood alcohol. In New York City in 1917 deaths from alcohol were 568; in 1921, 119. These fatalities from wood alcohol are slowly teaching the people the dangerous character of liquor. With all of these deaths from wood alcohol, however, there is not one killed to-day by it to where half a dozen died through the use of liquor under the license system.

6. INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT DUE TO LOSS OF EMPLOYMENT BY WORKERS IN 45 INDUSTRIES DIRECTLY OR INDIRECTLY CONNECTED WITH THE MANUFACTURE OF LIQUORS.

Mr. Chairman, a large number of these factories, breweries, and distilleries are now used for legitimate business.

At least 90 per cent of former saloon, brewery, and distillery property has been converted to legitimate uses. For example: National Capital Brewing Co., Washington, D. C., now Carry Ice Cream Co.; House of Correction, Ipswich, Mass., now a shoe factory; Coors Brewery, Golden, Colo., now making malted milk; Lone Star Brewery, San Antonio, Tex., now cotton mill; at New Orleans one brewery is now operated by Farmers' Cooperative Rice Milling Co. (Inc.), and another brewery plant has erected a four-story chocolate products manufacturing plant and is planning to convert its brewing plant into fruit and vegetable dehydrating plant; the Manila-Anchor Brewery, Dobbs Ferry, is being run by Pacific Trading Corporation, which manufactures butter substitute; the Wahl-Henius Institute, Chicago, formerly devoted to research in connection with brewing industry, purchased by American Institute of Baking for research work; in New York City three famous old cafés have been leased by Nedick Orange Drink Co., they are Bridge Café, old Easter Hotel, and Miller's Café; Sherry's Restaurant, New York City, has become a candy shop.

Many of these places are reported as employing more men than before being converted.

7. INCREASE IN TAXES TO CITY, STATE, AND NATIONAL GOVERNMENTS AMOUNTING TO APPROXIMATELY $1,000,000,000 A YEAR.

Oh, yes; it is true there has been some loss of revenue. The people understood this when they prohibited liquor. They reached the conclusion that it is just as bad for the Government to take money from a business which debauches the people as it would be for a parent to take money from an individual who would drunkardize or debauch a member of the family. We can not build a great Nation out of blood money. There are many compensations for the loss of the revenue; less drunkenness, less crime and misery coming from the drink craze; increased wealth, health, and happiness.

WORKERS VOTE DRY.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the working people of our country who are clamoring for the return of the liquor traffic. It is a known fact that during the last six years whenever the question has been voted upon in industrial States and the great manufacturing centers, prohibition of the liquor traffic has been sustained by increasing majorities.

Some time ago the Literary Digest desired to learn the attitude of the workingmen regarding prohibition and sent out a questionnaire to labor leaders in the different States of the Union. The question asked was:

HAS PROHIBITION BEEN A BENEFIT TO THE WORKINGMAN AND HIS FAMILY?

Replies came from every State in the country, and 345 of the spokesmen of labor who replied stated unreservedly that prohibition has been a great benefit to the workingman and his family. Only 143 were of the opposite opinion.

I desire to read one or two of the answers submitted by union labor officials to the questionnaire:

STRONG FOR PROHIBITION.

One Washington union official declares that he has worked for prohibition in that State for 20 years and that his organization is unreservedly for prohibition. A Pennsylvania secretary claims that prohibition has been a great cause for clear thinking among the workers, and another Washington district organizer tells us that prohibition has developed independence in the worker.

An Illinois secretary says that he is not a "dry man," but that it is his honest conviction that "booze will ruin the best of men," and another Illinois union official from a coal-mining community gives as his interesting opinion the fact that in that vicinity they attribute the success of the coal miners' negotiations to the fact that prohibition was the rule. "It kept men's brains clear and kept a little money in their pockets while the negotiations were going on," he adds.

A Kansas official tells us that his organization believes that prohibition has been a benefit to workingmen and their families. Out in Montana, where "bad booze brings 50 cents a drink," a union secretary favors us with the following interesting news:

HOW "WETS" WORKED.

"During the prohibition fight certain officials of labor unions, at the instigation and in the pay of the 'wet' interests, campaigned the State in autos, proclaiming that they represented a certain number of union men and women who were opposed to making Montana dry.

"Other members of the same unions, in several instances, inserted advertisements in the daily papers to the effect that the campaigners were representing nothing but their own interests and the interests of the persons who were financing the propaganda work."

From Texas comes the theory that "with booze gone and reason restored" the era of unrest will soon pass, while other union secretaries in New York and Michigan give identical statements to the effect that "since prohibition is in force the workers are capable of clearer thinking and do more of it. Consequently, the labor movement is sure to advance as private stocks and 'bootleggers' decrease." A Massachusetts secretary tells us that "money which formerly bought whisky is now buying happiness for the workingman's family."

GLAD TO VOTE DRY.

"Prohibition now, henceforth, and forever!" is the slogan of a New Orleans union official, and a Florida secretary declares emphatically that prohibition has been a benefit to workingmen and their families, and thanks us for the opportunity of voting. From Iowa comes detailed reasons why the majority of the executive board of the State federation of labor favors prohibition:

"Prohibition has been a benefit to organized laboring men and women. Trade-union activities are directed principally along two lines—the securing of better wages and working conditions, and legislation that will be beneficial to labor.

"If a union is to be successful in bettering the condition under which its members work and increasing their wages, it is necessary that the membership give the organization their cooperation and support. This can be done in no better way than by attending the meetings and taking an interest in affairs. Practically all business of the union originates in the meetings. In the days when the union meeting was competing with the saloon for attendance it was usually the rule that the saloon was more attractive to some than the union meeting. This fact alone deprived the union of a number of men who would have been active workers and whose counsel would have been beneficial. Many of the best workers we have in the trade-union movement to-day were a few years ago taking little interest in union affairs. You ask about their families. I take the position—and it is not original—that anything that is of real benefit to the workingman is of equal benefit to his family. I believe that a dollar invested in the home or for food or clothing is better for the family than the same dollar invested in liquor would be.

"Before prohibition became effective the wet and dry issue entered into nearly every political campaign in the Nation. State, county, and municipality. The result was that a great number of laboring men voted for a candidate who was wet or dry and paid little attention to his attitude on questions which were of vital interest to laboring men and women. It was a difficult matter to get laboring men to unite on a candidate who was fair with labor, as they were usually split by the injection of the wet and dry issue. We have now eliminated this question, and it will be easier to get our own membership aligned with candidates for public office who are fair when labor legislation is being considered. I believe that the future elections will show that to be a fact."

FAMILIES BETTER FED AND CLOTHED.

"We are now building homes for families and children with the money which we used to spend for whisky, and our families are better fed and clothed," asserts a California union official, and a Colorado secretary echoes this sentiment.

"God bless our prohibition leaders!" cries a Louisiana union official; "prohibition is a blessing to the workingmen of America." A Maine secretary believes that prohibition "protects the weak man or boy not only from himself but from his friends; it is making new men out of derelicts every day," he adds. One secretary from Massachusetts, who is for prohibition nevertheless, protests against the "bitter hop beers sold since 1914," and another Massachusetts union official "hankers for his beer," although he admits that "prohibition is doing a lot of good." The desire for beer is echoed by many other officials in different States, although each agrees that whisky and brandy should be under the prohibition ban. One secretary in Missouri, who represents 225,000 members, tells us that the majority are in favor of prohibition, and another Missouri assistant chief of police declares that "the more the workingmen see of prohibition the better they like it."

WHISKY A CURSE.

"Whisky has been a curse to the workingman," declares a New Jersey union official, and a New Hampshire secretary is glad that prohibition is being enforced, and asserts that it will "improve the morals of the workingman and raise his standard of living." Another New Jersey secretary votes for prohibition "with reservations," and believes that our digest "will lead to a better understanding of this important question, and that in handling it you will have accomplished a great work." Says this man, who tells us he represents the attitude of the majority of the 30,000 workers in his organization:

"There can be no question but that prohibition is beneficial to workingmen and their families. Still its enforcement appeals to our men as an infringement on their personal liberties. It also seriously affects thousands of workers who for years have made their living in breweries, saloons, and kindred places. Some of these men may be able to adjust themselves in new employments in many instances, while others will find it next to impossible to do so. We find that our men want prohibition for their children, but not for themselves."

SALVATION OF UNION LABOR.

"Prohibition means the salvation of union labor," we are told by a business agent of the Shipping Union of California, and a Montana secretary submits the interesting fact that 6,000 workingmen in his State voted themselves dry and would not care to go back to the old conditions. "Many notorious drunkards have paid up their debts and are now well dressed, happy, and contented," he adds. "The passing of the saloon is welcomed by all," agrees a New Jersey union official, and a New York secretary declares that its passing has meant to the laboring man "better health, a happier home, and more comforts for his children."

We are told by a union secretary from New Jersey that "outside the Declaration of Independence the prohibition amendment is the best thing that has happened to this glorious country." From Alabama, Illinois, Washington, and Massachusetts come statements to the effect that crime has decreased during the era of prohibition. A union official of Portland, Oreg., declares that while the organization of which he is the secretary is made up of Greeks, Italians, Turks, and Negroes, "they are unanimously for prohibition." A Montana secretary tells us that 95 per cent of the organized workers are benefited by prohibition, and a Washington secretary of an international union wishes to go on record as saying that "prohibition has been one of the greatest blessings to the workers, and that they are truly grateful for it." In conclusion, he adds, "in making this statement I speak for the great majority."

THE REAL PURPOSE.

Mr. Chairman, what is the real purpose of the agitation for light wine and beer? It is nothing more nor less than an attempt to resurrect the legalized liquor traffic, with its inevitable trail or misery, want, and crime. It would be only the opening wedge. If beer and wine are only the harmless beverages that their advocates claim, does anybody honestly think that those who crave intoxicating drink would be satisfied? Of course not. They would still insist on their whisky, their brandy, and their gin.

How could the sale and distribution of beer and wine be regulated? Is it proposed to permit the traffic in these liquors indiscriminately in public places, restaurants, hotels, and cafés, and throw the cloak of respectability about the business, thus making it an even greater temptation to young men and women than the old-time saloon? Is it proposed to permit the sale of beer and wine over the grocery-store counter and encourage the use of alcohol in the homes?

No; this Nation knows that the liquor traffic can not be regulated. Years of experience all over the country have proven that. It always has defied the law of the land, as much or more before prohibition as since. Traffic in beer and wine would only vastly increase the opportunity for the sale and use of illicit hard liquors and bootleg whisky. The country would be far worse off from the standpoint of prohibition enforcement than it is now even if the present laws are being violated as generally as the advocates of beer and wine contend. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOLL].

Mr. STOLL. Mr. Chairman, the condition of the country since the close of the World War, and the slowness with which we have returned to normal conditions, have been cause for deep concern to all. While a reaction was due to follow this cataclysm that affected the world, it was confidently expected that America would be able to rapidly readjust herself. But this was an error. Unfortunately, at the close of the war and since, the Congress has been in control of the Republican Party and the policies pursued have been both ill timed and ill conceived. It has been a case of the blind leading the blind. The country has continued to grope its way in darkness through a labyrinth of business depression and general confusion, and our ship of state has been as an unmanned barque on an unknown sea. The Republican Party, true to form, set out to legislate for the special interest, unmindful of the crying needs of the masses, with the result that the country is still suffering, and as yet no relief is in sight. Great promises were made, the so-called great minds were called into conference, a great hue and cry were made to chase away the bugaboo of hard times, the Congress was called in extra session, and with great ado and pomp proceeded to do nothing.

The people are dissatisfied, millions are without employment, financial ruin is staring hundreds of thousands in the face, chaotic conditions are existing in many sections, our strong young men who answered the call in time of war and fought our battles beyond the seas are apparently forgotten and many are unable to get employment.

In the meantime the country is suffering, and it will continue to suffer until Congress turns its back on the insistent demands of the special interest and seeks to find a solution of the troubles of the great mass of the people who are murmuring under their present-day burdens.

In seeking to find the real problems that confront us and the proper solution of them we frequently go far afield in our search, and oftentimes undertake to remedy a supposed trouble of the body politic before we ascertain the truth concerning it. A country as big as ours of necessity has manifold resources, and the development of these various resources makes many problems. There are problems peculiar to different sections of the country, and they each in turn present problems, some small and some large, some local and some national.

It is the duty of the Government to promote certain commercial or business activities for the common good, and it is equally the function of the Government to regulate certain commercial or business activities for the protection of the Government. For instance, any business that grows so big that it absorbs all competition and arbitrarily undertakes through its monopoly to control trade for its own selfish ends and to the detriment of the masses of the people should properly be regulated by the Government through salutary laws. This is supposed to be a Government of the people, and as such should so function year by year as to make possible living conditions that guarantee a prosperous and happy people, and which compel all agencies that function under it to stay all operations that work an injustice on the whole people for the benefit of the few. Interference by the Government with private business is not desirable and should only be done when the public welfare demands it; but when it becomes necessary to do so to safeguard the interest of the people, then we should not hesitate to act. This Government must be kept a Government of the people.

In order to keep this a Government of the people and at the same time make possible a minimum regulation of private business it is necessary for the Government to promote certain commercial or business activities for the common good.

There is a particular business that needs attention and which has long been neglected that I desire to call to the attention of the Congress, with the hope that some efforts will be made to establish a new basis on which it can be operated. I refer to the business of farming. There are some who are always ready to decry any legislation that refers to this particular interest, on the ground that it is class legislation. This is untenable. The farming interest is so large that it touches every other industry and directly affects every individual.

I can not conceive of legislation that benefits the farming interest that can be unfair to the balance of the people of the country. Agriculture is not sectional; if the farmers are prosperous, the balance of the country will be prosperous also; and legislation which helps the condition of the farmer helps also the rest of the country, and therefore can not be properly designated as class legislation.

The census of 1920 gives some valuable information relative to our agricultural operations, and it is advisable for those whose business it is to legislate to study this most interesting compendium. In it we find that there are 6,448,343 farms in the United States. By "farms" is meant a given acreage of land which is farmed by one person directing agricultural operations by his own labor or by assistance of others. A farmer, according to the census definition, must direct the operations of his farm, and does not include owners of farming land cultivated by others under rent contracts. Of these farms 3,925,090 are operated by owners, 2,454,804 by tenants, and 68,449 by managers.

The total acreage in farms in 1920 was 955,883,715 acres, and of this 503,073,007 acres were classified as improved land. The average acreage per farm was 148.2 acres. The value per farm is fixed at $12,084. It is interesting to note that of the total number of farms 796,535 have an average of less than 20 acres each, that there are 1,503,732 farms with an acreage between 20 and 49 acres, and that of farms with acreage of 50 to 99 acres there are 1,474,745. This means that of all the farms in the United States more than one-half of them, or to be exact 3,775,012, are small farms of less than 100 acres, and that of this number 2,300,267 are farms of less than 50 acres. In other words, more than one-third of the farmers of the United States are small farmers, and tend less than 50 acres of land. It is also worthy of note that there are 261,719 farms that are operated by females, and that of the total number of farms in the United States in 1920, 76.3 per cent were operated by native white farmers, 9 per cent by foreign-born white farmers, and 14.7 per cent by colored farmers.

Of the total farms in the United States operated in 1920 by their owners, 1,416,306, or 37.2 per cent, were mortgaged, while in 1910 census 33.2 per cent were reported as mortgaged. These figures do not include the farms operated by tenants of managers; if these were included it would probably bring the per cent of mortgaged farms up to about 50 per cent. Of the total number of farmers reporting a mortgage, only 1,193,047 gave the amount of the debt, which in the aggregate amounted to $4,003,767,192. On this same property the value was placed at $13,775,500,013, showing the property to be mortgaged to about one-third of its value.

These statistics show how big the farming industry is, how necessary it is to the Nation, and the general condition it is in, and it behooves the Congress to consider it the first big business of the country and to treat it accordingly. When we stop to reflect that there are nearly 6,500,000 individual farmers in the United States and there are more than 12,000,000 men who are engaged in this work; that the permanent investment of these farmers in land and equipment amounts to approximately $80,000,000,000, and that the output of these farms is worth $25,000,000,000 annually, can we longer dispute the right of the farmer to demand the necessary legislation to safeguard his interest?

To properly equip his farm so as to successfully produce the soil crops and raise his live stock, the farmer must annually purchase great quantities of manufactured material, and to enable his family to enjoy the comforts to which they are entitled he must purchase on the open market wares and merchandise of all kinds. This means, in the aggregate, an expenditure of many billions of dollars. For the farmer to purchase on the market as his needs require, he must be prosperous. And to be prosperous he must get a fair price plus his cost in putting his products on the market, otherwise he will have nothing with which to buy, and in the proportion that he fails to realize a profit on his produce the general business of the country suffers.

In considering the business of farming there are three primary questions that must be given consideration, namely, production, transportation, and marketing. Neither of these questions have been given the attention to which they are entitled. They are interwoven each with the other and bear on the general question so proportionately that each must be solved in order to reach the farmer's basic trouble. And until it is done we need not expect peace, happiness, and contentment to abound; when solved we may expect an era of unprecedented prosperity.

The first problem that confronts the farmer is production. He must produce intelligently and economically. In other words, he must produce that for which there is a market; he must produce only in such quantities as the market requires; and he must produce as economically as possible.

In considering the question of production, if we give it intelligent consideration, we must take notice of irrigation and drainage, both of which are most important adjuncts of cultivation. One of the greatest expenses of farmers is the failure of his farm to produce. To prepare his soil, plant and cultivate, and then fail to make a crop is most disastrous, yet it frequently happens, and in this way heavy financial losses annually befall the farmer. There is uncertainty as to what the yield of his fields will be, as he has to depend entirely upon what the seasons will be. In certain sections there is too much moisture, and in other sections there is too little. It is, therefore, of paramount importance that the dry zones should be irrigated and the moist zones should be drained. If this is done, the farmer can plant with a reasonable assurance that he will get a fair yield. To irrigate and drain properly there must be Federal aid. Already forward steps have been taken in irrigating the arid areas of the West, but to date nothing has been done to drain the fertile lands that are now useless for cultivation because of an excess of moisture. In the South nothing has been done by the Federal Government to aid in making the swamp lands fit for agricultural purposes, while in the West the Government has been reclaiming arid lands by irrigation for two decades. In the South there are millions of acres of swamp and low lands that are now unfit for cultivation that would be the most productive of our farm lands if properly drained. In my own district there are thousands upon thousands of acres of land that do not yield revenue sufficient to pay the taxes on it, and yet this same land if drained would produce abundantly. Our rivers are as crooked as the proverbial ram's horn, and so sluggish that they fail to act as drainage basins to any appreciable extent. If these rivers were straightened and the beds lowered a few feet they each would drain great areas that are now useless swamps.

The real problem of reclaiming our swamp lands by drainage is a financial one, and the Federal Government is the only source from which adequate aid can be secured. To drain successfully large areas must be included in any given drainage basin, and this means large expenditures, so large in fact that few drainage projects in my section have been successfully financed. The average drainage district in South Carolina, in which a small creek is the drainage basin for the area to be drained, the average cost is about $20 per acre. To drain 50,000 acres means, therefore, an expenditure of $1,000,000. This presents a financial problem not easy to solve, and unless provision is made for Federal aid, by which the landowners can borrow the necessary money from the Government on a plan that permits amortization to extend over a period of years, these swamp lands will ever remain as they now are—a liability rather than an asset to the farmers who own them.

And in this connection I desire to call attention to the Bankhead bill, H. R. 6048. Under the provisions of this bill a great forward step would be taken in developing our natural resources, and would make possible the drainage of thousands of acres of land that are now useless, but which once drained would prove among the most fertile lands known to agriculture. To my mind it is most expedient at this time to enact such legislation. To reclaim our rich lowlands would make it possible for the farmer to produce at a reduced cost of production. He could plant with more definite ideas of what his yield would be, for with drainage his hazards would be materially lessened. Not only would the farmer be benefited but the country at large would also be benefited in the general prosperity incident thereto accruing in the savings in cost to producer and in cost to consumer.

It is rather remarkable that our Government has given so little attention to drainage, and it is as inexcusable as it is remarkable. Drainage statistics were gathered for the first time with the taking of the last census. Only 5.5 per cent of all the lands in the United States is provided with sufficient artificial drainage to benefit it for agricultural purposes. To-day 40,000,000 acres of our land need drainage. And yet the question is not apparently receiving serious consideration, despite the fact that the average cost of draining in the United States is only $6.64 per acre as against $26.80 per acre for irrigation. The value of the crops raised on irrigated lands of the West in 1919 was $800,000,000, or an average of $76.41 per acre. With the climate of the South and the natural fertility of its soil as factors the drainage of its lowlands is a better agricultural proposition than is irrigation of arid lands, and it is a crime that its sectional location should have caused Federal aid to be denied all these years to the most fertile, if drained, agricultural lands in our country.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOLL. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Would it not be well for the gentleman to mention the fact that in addition to the cost of six dollars and some odd cents for drainage, in the lands of the South, there is also a clearing charge which must be met and which is a much larger item than even the cost of drainage?

Mr. STOLL. That is true, but that is a question which will solve itself.

Mr. ARENTZ. That must follow the drainage, because without clearing the drainage would do no good.

Mr. STOLL. Oh, there is a great deal of land that needs drainage, that is already cleared—a great deal of it.

Of all businesses farming is the biggest and it is also the most important, and yet it is the most loosely run. The farmer takes more chances, does more disagreeable work, works longer hours, takes less vacation, undergoes more hardships, gets the minimum of thanks for what he does, is given more promises, is humbugged by more people, swindled more in the marts of trade, and gets less for his year's work than any other business man in the world. And there is a reason for it. Scattered here and there throughout the country he plants, cultivates, harvests, and markets his produce almost wholly independent of his fellow farmers. As a result they are unconsciously antagonistic one to the other and frequently what one does is detrimental to the interest of his neighbor. The great majority of farmers plant without any knowledge of what the market conditions are and without any idea of what will be realized in money from the sale of their produce. There is absolutely no system among them and the law of supply and demand is utterly ignored, primarily because of the farmer's isolation from his fellow farmers and his inability to obtain the necessary information on which to plan and work out successfully these economic problems.

A farmer plants for two purposes—to supply his own needs and to exchange his surplus and raw material crops on the markets for its equivelant in money. He plants with the idea of selling the bulk of his produce on the market. Our lands are fertile, our farmers hard working, and the crops raised by them are abundant, and yet the great majority of our agriculturists are needy and very few really make any money. At best the average farmer gets only a poor living for himself and family. To-day farming is not a profitable industry. That this is the case shows that there is something radically wrong.

The question of farm production is one that should receive our most serious consideration. It is not merely a question for the individual farmer, but it is one for the Nation. It is too big a proposition for the individual farmer or a group of farmers to undertake to solve. The individual producers of a given farm product can not even begin to solve the problem of production, and even one State of a belt of States that grow a certain farm product can not of itself successfully solve it. There must be a united effort of all growers of a given product along stated plans in order to effect any results. Of all businesses farming is the only one where billions of dollars worth of stuff is placed upon the market every year without any thought as to the demands of the markets. Farmers alone blindly produce, blindly throw their produce on the market, and blindly accept the buyer's price as the market value of their produce. Manufacturers of leather goods, cotton goods, woolen goods, farm implements, and so forth, manufacture according to orders received for their product or upon accurate knowledge as to what supply the market will demand. A farmer plants his crop without knowledge of what the supply on hand is and not knowing what the demand for his product will be. He just trusts to luck and plants. If the seasons are bad generally for a given belt and the yield is small, perhaps he realizes a fair price for what his farm produces. But if it is a good crop year, and usually it is, he finds that there is an overproduction and he is forced to sell for what he can get, and frequently finds out that he can not sell at all. But even when he can find a market he frequently has to sell at a price that is below the cost of production, and he gets no interest on the money he invested in his farming, no wages for the work that he did, and often finds that his capital is impaired as a result of his year's farming.

For the farmer to get what he is rightfully entitled to there must be some new rules in his economics. For a farmer to be a business success he should realize a sum that would represent a fair interest on the money he has invested in farming lands and equipment; a sum that would represent a fair wage for his daily labors, and then a sum that would represent a fair profit on the output of his farm. He is entitled to this, and when he fails to get it, his business can not be considered successful. As it is, however, the average farmer does not even get a profit on what he sells. There are many expenses incident to planting, harvesting, and marketing a crop, or to raising and marketing live stock, or to producing whatever goes to the market from the farm, and the farmer should get a reasonable profit above what it cost him. To do this there is one eternal law of economics that must be observed, and that is the law of supply and demand. To realize a fair price there must be a healthy demand, and in proportion that the supply is greater than the demand in that same proportion will the price decrease.

To observe the law of supply and demand there must be some source that will give information and intelligent direction to the farmer. This can not be done successfully by county or State bureaus because its scope is too restricted. Therefore, if it is done, it must be done by an agency of the Federal Government. It is the duty of the Congress to establish such an agency and see that it functions properly.

The second problem of the farmer is transportation. There is little demand for a farmer's produce on his farm; he must get it to the market, and the transportation of his produce is one of the most serious of his problems. There are three methods of transportation. The first is to the local market over the county highways; the second is over the railroads; and the third is over the waterways.

The highway that connects the farmer with the local market and shipping point is very important, though in this discussion it is secondary. It is sufficient to say that the aid that the Federal Government is giving to the States in building its highways is giving a great impetus to road building, and that if the progress that has been made in the last few years continues we will soon have comparatively good roads throughout the Nation. By all means the present policy of Federal aid to the State highways should continue, and every effort made to encourage the States to build permanent roads.

Rail and water transportation is a more serious problem and one which should receive immediate attention. The policy of our Government to foster the railroads to the detriment of the waterways has proven most disastrous. I am not hostile to railroads and am not adverse to legislation to aid them in solving their transportation problems, but I am unalterably opposed to the present policy of strangling inland water transportation in order to give the railroads a monopoly. Nature has given us many rivers that could be made navigable and which would give outlets to isolated sections and make possible a general development. In many sections profitable water transportation can be acquired by canals, and on the Atlantic seaboard, from Maine to Florida, untold development is possible through the perfecting of the intracoastal waterway projects. By cutting a few short canals, notably connecting Conway, S. C., with Wilmington, N. C., and Georgetown, S. C., and Charleston, S. C., inland transportation by water would be possible from the Gulf to New England. This would mean the cheapest possible transportation, and the freight rates which are now so prohibitory would of necessity have to be reduced by the railroads.

Water transportation by means of light-draft boats would be most economical. While it would be slower than by rail, the economy of it would make it worth while. Nonperishable goods can be shipped as well by boat as by rail, and the saving that would result in this cheaper mode of transportation would revolutionize business. To continue our present policy of neglecting our waterways in order to give the railroads a monopoly of the freight of the country is suicidal. Our inland waterways should become great carriers of freight, and if sufficient appropriations were made to open these natural highways of commerce between the States and protection withheld from the railroads in discriminating rates one of the country's real problems would be solved.

One of the principal causes that brought about the bankruptcy of the farmer is the high freight rates that they have been compelled to pay the railroads. It is estimated that the farmer purchases almost 50 per cent of all products of this country, and that they furnish about 40 per cent of the transportation. With the farmer buying and selling this large per cent of the country's produce, and having to pay the confiscatory rates that are now charged on all freight shipments, there is no wonder that he has reached a condition that borders on collapse. One cheek of the farmer is slapped when he buys and the other cheek slapped when he sells, and now he has no other cheek to turn, and from now on he is proposing to fight it out with all who conspire to his undoing. The farmer is in reality the foundation of our national prosperity, and in proportion that he is depressed in the same proportion will the country be depressed. He can not prosper when the railroads are paid more for hauling his produce than he receives for producing it. As it is, he is a vassal to the railroads. The Congress should act, and the most direct way to remedy the existing wrongs of interstate transportation is by developing our inland waterways.

While the development of our inland waterways is most important and its direct bearing on interstate and intrastate commerce can not be overestimated when considered from the viewpoint of the interest of the producing and consuming masses, still, to get the relief that the country is entitled to, the railroads must be compelled to adjust their freight rates. Farmers who specialize in truck, dairy products, and so forth, must rely on the quick transportation that the railroads furnish, for perishable stuffs must of necessity get a quick market. But it is poor business to both the farmer and the railroads for the freight and express charges to be greater than the selling price of the commodity, for when the farmer pays more freight than his product is worth he will quit shipping, and in the same proportion will the business of the railroads decrease. It is therefore urgently necessary that something be done at once to lower the tariffs that the farmer has to pay on freight shipments. Once the question of transporting the produce of the farmer to market on a fair and equitable basis is solved, a great barrier that now obstructs his road to prosperity will be removed and the first forward step in reducing the high cost of living will have been taken.

For the farmer to really prosper he must not only be assisted by the Government in producing economically and in accord with the law of supply and demand and in getting his produce to market at a reasonable cost, but he also must be assisted in marketing his produce in a business way. And the only way to do this is on a cooperative marketing plan. For this to be done successfully by the farmer it is necessary for the Federal Government to assist. Loans must be made available to cooperative marketing association so as to properly finance them. Farmers' marketing associations are not incompatible with the common good, for they can be so regulated as to protect the consumer. To the farmer they are absolutely necessary if he ever expects to sell in a businesslike way the produce which his farm yields him. The farmer of to-day takes the price fixed by the purchaser of his commodity; I hope the farmer of to-morrow will be able to fix his own price on what he sells. Other business men do, why not the farmer? To do this successfully he can not act independently or without due consideration of existing market conditions. The growers of a given farm product must act together, otherwise they will be at cross purposes, and thereby fulfill the prophecy that a house divided against itself must fall. Cooperative marketing means business methods applied to selling of his produce by the farmer.

I want to recapitulate what I have tried to give expression to in these remarks—that the Congress can by legislation give help to the farmers, and, I believe, very materially, in the following particulars:

First. Assist the farmers in regulating production, so as to keep within the well-defined rules of supply and demand, by furnishing them through Federal agencies accurate information as to the supply of every known farm product at the time of planting and the probable demand at the time of harvest, with an estimate of the acreage necessary to produce a reasonable supply.

Second. Assist the farmers in reducing the cost of production by Federal aid in irrigating arid areas and draining moist lands, thereby making possible to a reasonable certainty the yield farmers may expect on acreage planted and reduce to a minimum the loss now incident to too much or too little moisture.

Third. Continued assistance to the States in building good roads, thereby aiding the farmer in getting to the local market and shipping point his produce with the least possible delay and at the smallest expense.

Fourth. Necessary legislation to provide a system of inland waterways that will make available all navigable inland waters for purposes of transportation by means of light-draft boats, and thereby reduce freight tariffs.

Fifth. Regulation of railroad freight rates so as to guarantee fair rates to the shipper.

Sixth. Necessary legislation to provide loans for financing farmers' cooperative marketing associations, thereby making it possible for the individual farmer to operate in harmony with his fellow farmers in marketing his produce on a business basis that will give him a fair profit on what his farm produces.

This outline of legislation contains nothing revolutionary and would prove, if enacted into law, salutary upon the whole country. I am firmly convinced that if legislation as I have outlined were enacted wide development of the farming industry would result. Conferences and propaganda may have their proper place and may do some good, but what the country now needs is some affirmative action. The farming interest can not longer be made secondary in the scheme of restoring this country to normal conditions, for of all our industries the farming industry stands first in its need for legislation that will rehabilitate it. The work done by the farmer is most unique, for he creates. The manufacturer of cotton, wool, and leather depends on the farmer for his raw material and upon mother earth for the fuel or waterpower to run his machinery with which to manufacture it. The great steel and iron industries dig from the bosom of the earth the raw material that they manufacture into the finished product. For millions of years old mother earth has been storing for the kings of industry fuels and ores that make possible these great industrial plants. But not so with the farmer. He must dig, plant, and cultivate; he must take the hazards of the seasons and risk the ravages of insects and pests; his work is that of making fertile the spots that are barren, of transforming waste lands into fields of production, of cultivating from the sprouted seed to the fruition of harvest, of creating from the soil the substance for the world's millions.

I want to see prosperity return again to America, not to one section but to all sections, not to one industry or class but to all industries and to all classes. But the needs of my people—the people of my district and of my State I know more of, and it is them that I especially would serve. They have suffered long and as no other section of our land has suffered, and long have they looked for the coming of the day when they would shake the shackles of their oppression from them and achieve their commercial freedom. The fields of the sunny South are the Nation's most fertile; her husbandmen are skilled in the art of producing from the soil, yet they are still denied the recompense that should be given honest labor.

I shall continue to look toward the dawn and hope for the sunshine of the day when the southron will stand firm and serene, unburdened by debt and undisturbed by the exigencies of the morrow, monarch of his own broad acres, glorifying his Creator in making his fields yield the fruits of its kind, and serving his country as a planter and patriot.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I may not be able to get through with my remarks in the allotted time, and I also have some tables that I want to insert in the RECORD. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, we have up for consideration to-day the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture, the department of the Government having to do with the most important of all of our basic industries. In view of some things that have occurred of late, and what a patient public has had to put up with for a long time, it seems to me that this is an appropriate time for presenting to the House and to the country some information with reference to another basic industry which is second only to agriculture. I refer to the coal industry.

The coal industry is basic because our economic and industrial life is absolutely dependent upon a supply of coal. Industry in this age of mechanics and machinery depends upon power to run the various agencies of production and distribution. The source of the major portion of this power is coal. The maintenance of civilization as we know depends upon maintaining industry, and the maintenance of industry depends upon coal. There is nothing that can better command the attention of Congress, therefore, than the maintenance of our coal supply. Nature has done well by the United States, for we have inside of our own territorial limits one-half of the total world's supply of coal. It is estimated to be from three to four thousand billion tons. What a great advantage that is to us commercially and from the standpoint of national defense. The coal fields of Europe and the struggle for their possession has brought nations to war. Of this supply we are consuming something like 500,000,000 to 600,000,000 tons of coal a year, divided up approximately as follows: For manufacturing purposes, 50 per cent; for railroads, 25 per cent; for domestic uses, 18 per cent; for export purposes, 7 per cent. Bituminous coal can be found in various parts of the country, but the anthracite coal is located almost exclusively in a very small district of the State of Pennsylvania. It is estimated that 90 per cent of the coal mined goes into interstate or foreign commerce. Notwithstanding that the coal industry forms the very foundation of our economic and industrial life, the Nation finds its supply again threatened. Just as industry is emerging from a period of depression it is confronted with a coal strike and its attendant ills. The wage contract between the miners and the mine operators expires on April 1 next. The operators refuse to renew the present wage scale, claiming that the wages paid are excessive. The miners claim that they are underpaid now, and that they work only about 200 days a year instead of 300 days, as other people do. They demand a 6-hour day and a 5-day week, and to have their work better distributed over the 365 days in the year. As the operators and the miners quarrel, the public stands by practically helpless.

The public first fears that the strike will not be settled. Then it fears that it will be settled. It knows full well from past experiences that the interests of the public will be a matter of secondary consideration to both. Each group is principally interested in itself. If the strike comes and the President should follow the precedent of Roosevelt in 1903, an impartial tribunal will be established to adjust the differences between the mine operators and the workmen. But the tribunal will not have authoritative information as to the costs and profits of the owners or the yearly earnings and purchasing power of the workmen. It must depend upon information furnished by both operators and workmen, both of which are interested parties.

The miners claim that the value of anthracite coal has increased far more than wages. We know this, that in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Reconstruction it was undisputed that for the period 1914 to 1918, inclusive, the increase of labor costs at the mouth of the mine was $1.41 per gross ton. During the same period the increase of the retail price in New York City was $4.48 per gross ton. This is three times the labor cost increase during the same period.

There should be some governmental agency clothed with power to gather information currently and to keep it available for emergencies such as we had in 1920 and such as we are about to confront this spring. As it is, it must listen to the claims and proofs of both groups and practically confine itself to the evidence submitted by these groups who, as I have said, are primarily interested in themselves and the advancement of their own interests.

If my recollection is correct, anthracite coal in my own city of Minneapolis sold for about $9 per ton during the period 1914–15. To-day the retail selling price is about $18. Bituminous coal has increased in a similar proportion.

The farmer and the great user of coal, the manufacturer, have seen the prices of their products go down materially during the past two years. The farmer feels that the prices for his product have, in fact, reached the bottom. At the same time, the manufacturer and the farmer have witnessed the price of coal advance steadily year by year until at the present time it is considerably above the price charged during the war. The coal operator alone appears to be able to not only maintain war-time prices but to materially advance them.

Is this 100 per cent advance during the past six or seven years justified or is it the result of profiteering? The retailer denies any profiteering on his part, and substantiates his claim by the submission of proof. In any event, retailing is largely an intrastate transaction and is without the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

The coal operator and the wholesale dealer blame the railroads and attribute the advance to increased freight rates. The horizontal increases in freight rates have borne heavily on commodity rates, and in my judgment the rates on coal bear an undue proportion of the advances in recent years. It is particularly true of the anthracite coal carrying railroads. The impression seems to be quite general that these rates should come down.

The lake and rail rate from the anthracite fields of Pennsylvania to Minneapolis was $8.30 per ton last fall, and is made up as follows:

Approximate cost of a ton of anthracite at Minneapolis, Sept. 1, 1921.

(Prepared sizes, net ton—2,000 pounds.)

Freight rate to Buffalo (dumping charge included)	$3.50
Tax on same	.105
Vessel rate	.50
Tax on same	.105
Insurance	.005
Dockage (including unloading from boats, storing, handling, reloading, and degradation cost)	1.88
Freight rate to Twin Cities	2.23
Tax on same	.0669
	8.3019
Price per ton at mines ($8 per gross ton of 2,240 pounds) or per net ton of 2,000 pounds	7.14
Cost on cars Twin Cities	15.44

These figures were given me by the Director of the Geological Survey.

But while the freight rates are high and should, in my judgment, come down, the big factor in the present high prices of coal is not the retailer or the ordinary railroad company, but the coal operator and the mine owner.

In 1902, according to the figures furnished by the anthracite operators themselves, anthracite sold for $3.75 per ton at the mouth of the mine. It remained at this figure until June, 1912, when it was raised to $4 per ton.

The advances since then are as follows:

June, 1912	$4.00
May, 1916	4.40
May, 1917	4.70
December, 1917	5.05
November, 1918	6.10
August, 1919	6.60
April, 1920	7.45
October, 1920	7.95

A portion of one of these advances was made to cover an alleged increased cost of mining coal due to the imposition of a tonnage tax by the State of Pennsylvania. The tax was equivalent to a tax of about 10 cents per ton. The price of the coal at the mouth of the mine was increased 25 cents per ton, which the consumer, of course, paid. The operators contested the constitutionality of the law and refused to pay the tax, and the law was eventually held unconstitutional. The consumer paid to the operator, but the operator did not pay out the tax to the State.

Is this increase of 100 per cent in the cost of anthracite coal at the mouth of the mines justified? About one year ago the Federal Trade Commission endeavored to find out. With full appreciation of the effect of these advances and the added burden upon industry and the ultimate consumer, the Federal Trade Commission sought information from the coal operators as to the cost of operation, wages paid, sales realization, and margin of profits. Some of the companies complied. This information was published in groups and districts containing a considerable number of mines. The names of the individual operators were wholly eliminated and shielded. This order was contested by the attorneys for the National Coal Association, which comprises about 60 per cent of the coal operators of the country. They contended that the production of coal did not involve a question of interstate commerce, and therefore the Federal Government was without jurisdiction. An injunction was secured, and upon the granting of this injunction the Government appealed. That appeal is still pending in the courts in the District of Columbia.

Therefore, through the efforts of the operators the Government has been prevented from acquiring information which, in the face of the threatened strike and the effort that the Government is making and will continue to make to settle it, it would be found to be very helpful.

Note that the injunction was applied for and granted upon the theory that the production of coal did not involve interstate commerce.

About the same time, the regulatory commission of the State of Indiana issued an order from certain coal companies in Indiana requiring them to file with the State authorities a statement of the cost of mining coal. The National Coal Association, or some of its members, contested this order on the ground that almost the entire output of these mines would go largely into interstate commerce, and that the order therefore constituted an interference with interstate commerce and was wholly without the jurisdiction of the State of Indiana, and that only the Federal Government had the jurisdiction to require any such information. I quote from the opinion of the trial judges in the case of Vandalia Co. against Coal Commission of Indiana:

> When coal is severed from ground it becomes an article of commerce, and the owner, under the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, which recognizes no State lines, has the right, so far as any State is concerned, to contract to sell entire his output to citizens of other States.

In other words, the mining of coal is intrastate commerce when the Federal Government steps in for regulatory purposes, but it becomes interstate commerce when one of the States of the Union attempts to pass regulatory legislation. The National Coal Association and its members have, by these two proceedings, placed the public in a sort of constitutional "no man's land," where it is being shot at from both sides through the levying of increased prices for this necessity of life.

If these increased prices are justified, why the necessity for such tactics? If there is nothing to hide and conceal, there should be nothing to fear upon the part of the coal operators or its association.

However, the case against the coal operators for profiteering during the past two years does not rest upon conjecture and suspicion due to the suppression of information as to the cost of production and extent of earnings. It is proved by their own statements and dividend sheets.

It may be interesting to know that one coal operator, defending the industry before the Senate Committee on Manufacturing in the Sixty-sixth Congress, admitted that the coal profiteering in 1920 may have cost the American consumer $200,000,000 or, even, perhaps, six hundred millions.

Both bituminous and anthracite operators and mine owners have profiteered, as the several tables I shall place in the RECORD will show. These tables have been prepared by the Federal Trade Commission, or prepared by others and checked by the commission from figures submitted by the coal companies, either to the commission or the various financial publications.

Table 1, which follows, gives the net income of certain large bituminous coal companies during the period of 1912–1919:

Table 4 covers one-sixth of the bituminous operators of the country. They are scattered through several of the States. It gives comparative margins of profits during the period indicated. The average net income of this group in the year 1917 was 295 per cent over and above that of 1916. The average net income of 1918 was 185 per cent over that of 1916:

Now, let us take a glance at the anthracite operators. Anthracite coal is located in a tract covering about 490 square miles in Pennsylvania. Geographically nature made it a monopoly. Taking lessons from nature, a group of men have made it a business monopoly, for seven or eight corporations control 75 to 80 per cent of the anthracite output.

Table 5 shows the percentage of net income of these large anthracite companies on their capital stock. It means the percentage of net income in the war period over the prewar period. It will be observed that increases range from 9.2 per cent minimum to a maximum of 494 per cent. The general average was 89 per cent.

During this war period the Government was calling upon everyone to increase production. It was likewise true of coal. Did the production likewise increase? During the period 1912 to 1914—prewar—the total production in tons by these operators was 132,756,451, as against 148,118,826 for the 1916 to 1918 war period. The average increase in tons of war production over prewar production was 11.6 per cent, as against 89 per cent average percentage of increase of net income.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman give the source of his information?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. The authority for my information is the Federal Trade Commission, as they have obtained their figures from the carriers, the coal companies, or other sources.

Table 6 gives the large anthracite coal companies for the period 1912 to 1920, inclusive, and shows, so far as can be ascertained from the figures available, the capital stock, surplus, net worth, and bonded indebtedness. I call special attention to the marked increases in surplus and net worth during the period.

THE LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO.

In 1905 the coal company borrowed large sums from the railroad, and in return gave its certificates of indebtedness in the amount of $10,537,000. A part of these certificates were given in return for the stocks of some coal companies which were purchased from the railroad, and the remainder represented an exchange for some bonds of the coal company which had been held by the railroad. (Transcript of Record in Sherman Antitrust Case, v., p. 793.) It was not intended that any interest should be paid on these certificates, and up to 1912 none was paid. But in 1911 the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the case of Meeker & Co. v. Lehigh Valley Railroad, held that the interest on these certificates, amounting at 5 per cent to $526,850, constituted in all substantial respects a rebate to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (I. C. C. Reports, xxi, p. 161.) As the result of this finding the coal company, in March, 1912, paid up the arrearages of interest at the rate of 4 per cent, and canceled the certificates of indebtedness, payment being made partly in cash and partly by a new issue of 4 per cent bonds, which were given to the railroad. (Annual Report of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., 1912, p. 7.)

Using the $9,465,000 as capital reduces the percentage of net income from 123.7 to 25.7 for 1917 and from 197.8 to 41.1 for 1918. This will also alter the total capital stock of all companies for 1917 and 1918; also the total percentage of net income would be 31.8 and 24.9, respectively, instead of 36.6 and 28.8. However, see note 4 to this company, page 1584.

Temple Coal Co. This was originally the Temple Iron Co. in 1912, with capital stock outstanding of $2,500,000. In June, 1914, the Temple Coal Co. was organized and took over the coal properties of Temple Iron Co. Capital stock issued $1,000,000 common and $2,000,000 cumulative preferred. May 1, 1916, $800,000 preferred was retired at $105 and accrued dividends, and October 1, 1917, balance of preferred, $1,200,000 was retired at $105. (Moody's 1913, p. 4684; and 1918, p. 1616.) No balance sheet given or referred to in Moody's.

Table 7 shows the net income per annum during the period 1912–1920. The very large increases will be noted:

[1] Difference of $542,978 between figures in Mr. Lauck's table, and these figures is that amount charged to "New breakers and shop," which is in the nature of investment rather than operating expense and is added back to agree with figures in Moody's. (See Cumulative Corporation News, July, 1914.)
[2] Represents 18 months ending Dec. 31, 1917, when fiscal year changed from June 30.
[3] Difference of $210,116 between Lauck's figures and the above due to addition of that amount of net income for the period July 1 to Dec. 31, 1916, omitted by Lauck. Fiscal year changed.
[4] Not reported in Poor's Railroad Manual.

Table 9 gives the production in tons of anthracite per annum from 1912–1920. I commented a few minutes ago on bituminous and the increase of production of war period over prewar period of but 11.6 per cent. In other words, the increased profits heretofore shown and to be shown has been due not to increased production and increased tonnage sold but to practically the same tonnage at vastly greater margins of profit:

Table 10 gives the average yearly net income in cents per ton of coal mined during the period 1912–1920. Note the increase of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal Co. from 1.7 cents in 1912 to 61.9 cents in 1920. Furthermore, it will be observed that the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. increased from 48 cents per ton to 134.7. This again illustrates that increased earnings and profits have been due to greater margins per sale rather than to increased tonnage sold.

July 14, 1917, 30 per cent cash dividend, with permission to subscribe for 30 per cent of new stock. Ten per cent extra in 1918 paid in Second Liberty loan 4 per cent bonds. 1920 paid partly from surplus of former years. On Dec. 6, 1920, the United States Supreme Court ordered Lehigh Valley R. R. to dissolve the combination of the railroad and its principal subsidiary companies, and to redistribute stocks, bonds, and properties to make each component part in fact independent and competitive. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. was specifically named in the decree. (Poors & Moodys Manual of Industrials, 1921, p. 903.)

[9] 6 first half, 8 last half.

It will be observed that the Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co.'s net income averaged 10.12 per cent during the period. The Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. was 41.20 per cent. The Lehigh Valley Coal Co. averaged 38.36 per cent. The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co. from 1912 to 1918, inclusive, averaged 39.2 per cent. The Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. during the period 1912 to 1920 averaged 32.9 per cent. The Temple Coal Co. during the same period averaged 69.6 per cent. The average percentage of net incomes to capital stock of the six companies as given above during the period 1912–1920 was 38.2 per cent. It will be observed that one company's next income during the year 1918 was 50 per cent more than its capital stock. Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co. averaged 8 per cent throughout the 1912–1920 period; that the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre averaged 13 per cent throughout the same period; that the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. totaled 190 per cent in dividends during that period; that the Lehigh Valley Coal Sales Co., the selling agent of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., totaled 177½ per cent during that period; that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co. totaled 375 per cent during the same period. These coal companies were controlled during this period by the anthracite railroads, and later I shall call attention to the goodly earnings and dividends of these anthracite carriers.

Table 12 gives the common stock dividends. It will be noted that the maximum was as high as 85 per cent in one instance:

[2] Including a 10 per cent stock allotment at par.
[3] Including a 10 per cent stock allotment at par and a 15 per cent scrip dividend.

I shall now analyze some of these figures.

LEHIGH COAL & NAVIGATION CO.

a. Increased surplus from 1912 of one and one-half millions to over eighteen and one-half millions in 1920. An increase of about 1,150 per cent.

b. At same time paid dividends of 8 per cent per annum.

c. Increased average yearly net income per ton of coal mined from 62.3 cents to 92.4, or approximately 50 per cent.

d. Only increased production in 1920 over 1912 of but 20 per cent.

LEHIGH & WILKES-BARRE COAL CO.

a. Tonnage production reduced from 1920 below that of 1912 about one and one-third million tons, approximating a reduced production of about 30 per cent.

b. Increased average yearly net income per ton of coal mined from 48 cents in 1912 to 134.7 cents in 1920.

c. Increased surplus of three and one-half million in 1912 to twenty-seven millions in 1920, or nearly 900 per cent.

d. Total dividends paid during this period amounted to 305 per cent.

The stock of this coal company was owned largely and controlled by the New Jersey Central Railroad, known as an anthracite carrier. During the period of 1898–1918 this railroad paid 200 per cent in dividends. During the period 1903–1913 its net earnings on capital stock was 20.4 per cent.

LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO.

a. Decreased its tonnage production of eight and one-half millions in 1912 to eight and one-third millions in 1920.

b. During same period increased average yearly net income per ton of coal mined from 13.5 cents to 56.8 cents.

c. Reduced bounded debt from twenty millions to eleven and one-half millions.

d. Increased net worth from five and one-half millions to twelve millions.

e. And paid dividends during period of 190 per cent.

This coal company's stock is largely owned and the company controlled by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., which averaged during the same period 10 per cent yearly dividends.

LEHIGH VALLEY COAL SALES CO.

This company is the selling agency for the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. In the period 1912–1920 it paid in dividends 177½ per cent, equaling approximately 20 per cent per annum throughout the period. The combined dividends of railroad company, coal company, and sales company during this period totaled 457½ per cent, constituting an average combined dividend for these allied companies of 51 per cent per annum.

DELAWARE, LACKAWANNA & WESTERN COAL CO.

a. Tonnage production in 1912 was 9,233,000 tons. Reduced in 1920 to 9,098,000 tons, or a decreased production in tons of 2½ per cent.

b. At same time increased average yearly net income per ton from 22.9 cents in 1912 to 33.4 cents in 1920, or 50 per cent.

c. Paid in dividends during period a total of 375 per cent. I understand that during the period of 1898–1918 this coal company was under the control of a railroad company by the same name. This D., L. & W. R. R. Co. during the period of 1899–1918 paid in dividends a total of 444 per cent, constituting an average dividend per annum of 22½ per cent. The total dividend of coal company and coal carrier in the period of 1912–1920 is 580 per cent or an average combined dividend of 60 per cent per annum.

PHILADELPHIA & READING COAL CO.

a. Increased tonnage production from approximately 10,200,000 tons in 1912 to 10,800,000 tons in 1920—an increase of production of 6 per cent.

b. At same time increase average yearly net income per ton of coal mined from 1.7 cents in 1912 to 61.9 cents in 1920.

c. Increased surplus from one and one-half millions in 1912 to twenty-five and one-half millions in 1920—an increase of 1,700 per cent.

d. Increased net worth from nine and one-half millions to thirty-three and one-half millions, or 360 per cent.

e. No dividend information available.

During the period 1903–1913 the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., controlling this coal company, paid dividends averaging 22.7 per cent per annum. During the same period their net earnings averaged 31.65 per cent of the capital stock.

TEMPLE COAL CO.

a. Decreased production from 1912 of 1,730,000 tons to 1,144,000 tons in 1920. Approximately 33⅓ per cent decrease.

b. At same time increased average yearly net income per ton of coal mined from 42.2 cents to 105.8 cents.

c. Increased percentage of net income on capital stock of 29.3 per cent in 1912 to 121 per cent in 1920.

While the coal companies were making these excessive profits the anthracite carriers owning or controlling the stock in the coal companies were paying good dividends or making large earnings. I have already called attention to some of them.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in its report of 1915 on anthracite rates recognizes the fact that the anthracite roads dominated anthracite coal production. I quote from the report as to ownership of stock, as follows:

Coal company.	Owner of stock of coal company.	Par value of stock owned.	Date stock was acquired by owner.

[1] Holding company.

The carriers own the entire outstanding stock of the coal companies named above with but one exception; the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey owns $8,491,150 of the $9,210,000 stock issued by the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co.

The claim was made before the Senate Committee on Reconstruction that the railroad rates for the carrying of anthracite coal by the anthracite carriers averaged two and one-half to three times the operating cost. The receipts from carrying coal constitute a great percentage of the gross income of these roads. The complaint is that these unreasonable and unjust rates have had their unreasonableness multiplied by the horizontal increases in commodity rates during the past four or five years. I again quote from this Interstate Commerce Commission report showing the tonnage shipped during the month of November, 1912, by the coal companies over the anthracite roads. This tonnage constitutes a very large proportion of the total tonnage.

[1] Transcript of record, U. S. v. Reading Co. et al., United States Supreme Court, 1915, vol. 2, p. 113.

The Philadelphia & Reading average dividend for the 10-year period is 22.7 per cent. In addition it increased its net surplus from five millions to eleven and one-half millions, or over 100 per cent. Almost as good a showing is made by the Central Railroad of New Jersey, which increased its surplus from nine millions to over fourteen millions and at the same time paid dividends of a yearly average of 9.4 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is there any reason, then, why the rate on coal should not be reduced on those coal-carrying roads?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is certainly no reason, so far as I can find out, why the rates on the coal-carrying roads should not be reduced.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the rate on all coal should naturally be reduced. They are getting more for it than is necessary to earn their 6 per cent.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But the beneficiary of the high rates on coal are not the roads or the lake companies that carry it, but these same interests that own the mines. They get a big price and a short haul.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the excess of over 6 per cent go into the Treasury for the benefit of the smaller roads?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The anthracite roads are under the terms of the transportation act.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then the excess over the 6 per cent would not go into their fund?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Not since the passage of the transportation act. However, these figures are prior to 1920.

Mr. STEVENSON. That depends on whether the roads have signed the contract. They were not required to sign the contract to accept the first compensation during the first six months.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That was the 6-month period. That was a question of contract. But as to the standard return, following the 6-month guaranty period there is a recapture clause. But I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] that up to the present time no railroad, so far as I am advised, has paid over a penny on this provision. I do not know whether they ever will. They have not paid up to the present time.

Mr. LONDON. And under the Esch-Cummins Act the railroad companies have to turn over to the Government one-half of the amount earned above 6 per cent, do they not?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is approximately correct.

Mr. LONDON. And if they earn a dividend, say, of 12 per cent they retain 9 per cent—only one-half of the excess?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That is the provision of the act; but, as I say, there is no railroad that has turned over any proportion of that under the terms of the act.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is put into a general fund for the purpose of advancing money for equipment to roads that have not sufficient equipment, but they have to pay that money back some time and have to pay interest on it. The road has not lost what it put in there itself—an investment on a certain trust fund.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The provision referred to was to help out the weaker roads.

Now, bear in mind that the figures that I have given here have in large part been based upon figures furnished by the companies voluntarily at some time or other, either for investment purposes in the various financial journals or publications or voluntarily through some governmental agency during the period of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I was told just a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, that I had seven minutes, and I am positive since then I have not used three.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk said that was a mistake.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I know; but it seriously interferes with my presentation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitancy in submitting to the committee that these earnings and profits, as shown by coal company and coal carrier, are excessive and constitute an unjust charge, not only on the domestic consumer but upon business and industry. Yet, I venture to say, if the payment of excessive prices for coal would bring real service and a steady maintenance of supply, that the country might be disposed to pay these excessive prices and say little. But the payment of these prices does not insure a maintenance of our coal supply. It is not a price paid for efficient service. Every year or two the maintenance of our coal supply is threatened. It either is a breakdown of production through a strike or a breakdown of distribution through lack of proper distributing facilities. The country is again threatened with a strike. If it comes, there is no counting its cost or duration. The coal famine or threatened coal famine of a year ago cost the country several hundred millions of dollars. What this strike will cost if it comes no one can predict. Truly, Mr. Secretary Hoover—I think it was he—was right in characterizing the coal industry as the worst run basic industry in the country.

Furthermore, we not only face a strike but we face it unprepared. We know nothing about the operators' business, except as here and there they have chosen to furnish information to the Government or public for reasons of their own. As to capitalization, costs and profits, depreciation charges, overhead expenses, and their reasonableness, the Government knows practically nothing. Wrapped up in the coal business are numerous contracts and leases skillfully drawn to baffle the understanding of the most expert lawyers. While the Government knows little about the business details of the operators, it knows little more by way of accurate, authoritative information as to the yearly earnings of the workmen, the number of days employed per year, and the purchasing power of the wage in the locality of the mine.

It seems to me that the Federal Government should have all this information, and it is the duty of this Congress, in my judgment, to confer this power in express terms upon some governmental agency, so that these coal companies can be compelled to currently report this information. It will then be available for use at any time for any emergency. [Applause.]

One year ago the Senate Committee on Reconstruction recommended such a measure. I introduced a similar measure in the House. It starts out on the broad premise that in this country coal is a public necessity and essential to the health and for the life of the people. It therefore expressly charges coal with a public use. It does this on the theory that the Federal Government is necessarily concerned with the health and lives of its citizens. Ninety per cent of the coal mined goes into interstate-commerce channels. In my judgment, the Federal Government has jurisdiction under the commerce clause, but this bill predicates jurisdiction not only on the commerce clause but upon the general obligation resting upon all governments, and our own Government in particular, to protect the health and lives of its citizens.

The power to ascertain this information is conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission. Soon the attention of everyone will be directed to the question of coal supply, owing to the threatened strike and the country's unpreparedness for meeting it. It occurs to me, therefore, that this is an appropriate time for Congress to consider a measure of this kind

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will permit, if the Federal Trade Commission's power is contested in the courts on the ground that the mining of coal is not an interstate effort, will not your legislation be subject to the same controversy?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In part, yes; but the Government would rest its case not only upon the interstate-commerce clause in the Constitution but on the broader ground that coal is a public necessity, and that it is required for the health and general welfare of the people, and that the commission, as an agency of Congress, has the right to acquire information pertaining to matters of such vital moment to all the people.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will permit, flour or wheat is also in the nature of a public necessity, and we have not the right to go into the production of wheat unless it goes into interstate commerce.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I am sorry, but my time is so short and will not permit further discussion. But we regulate banks, and yet they are no more important than the mines and the distribution of coal at a reasonable price. We regulate public utilities and the railroads vastly more than is contemplated in this legislation, and yet the railroads can not run when the mines do not run.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the gentleman draw a distinction between natural resources and things created by the effort of man?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes. But I could not take the time to enter into a discussion with the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the tables I have presented show gross profiteering upon one of the great necessities of life. Thousands of home owners in the north section of our country simply must use anthracite coal and they can not pay $18 per ton. There is no reason why they should pay it. The earnings made by these coal companies could not have been made if they had sold their coal at only a just and reasonable margin of profit. How much more they have made only they themselves know. The public is entitled to full and complete information regarding this basic industry. If the Government does not take steps to acquire this information it is not showing that regard for the health and lives of its citizens that it should. This bill is not a drastic, restrictive, regulatory measure; it only seeks information, and relies upon an informed and aroused public opinion to correct any abuses ascertained in acquiring the information.

The Director of our Geological Survey has aptly called coal "the staff of life of industry and the lifeblood of transportation." The statement is an accurate one. It is time for the Government to so consider this industry, and to that end, Mr. Chairman, this Congress ought to hasten the enactment of some legislation of this character. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN] such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity of calling to the attention of the House a condition that exists in very few States of the Union. I recognize the fact that it is peculiar to only a few States, and on account of that fact in the past the House has not given the matter a great deal of consideration. I am not altogether certain that it has ever been called to the attention of the House, but it is a matter that should receive the careful consideration of the Members of this great law-making body.

A number of the leading educators of my district and State have communicated with me on the subject, expressing their desires and wishes and offering such advice and suggestions as they have with regard to remedying the situation. I have taken all these suggestions into my most careful consideration and from the mass of information I have received I have prepared and introduced a bill for the consideration of the proper committee and the House, with the hope that at an early date this situation will be taken care of.

In every State where Indians have received allotments these tracts of land are intermingled with lands belonging to the white man, the Indian allotment being nontaxable and the white man's land being taxable, which results in whole geographical townships and school districts in some instances being principally nontaxable land.

The gradual trend toward the policy of sending Indians in districts of this kind to the State schools upon paying a certain inadequate amount daily per scholar results in the white man being overtaxed and having a very poor school and in the Indian paying for sending his children to a very poor school, to the disadvantage and detriment of Indians and whites alike.

The policy of the Government has been to discontinue such schools as Rainy Mountain and other Indian schools as rapidly as possible. I tried the other day on the floor of the House to get an appropriation for the Rainy Mountain school, with no success other than to have my esteemed and distinguished friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], say to me, "Young man, you made an excellent presentation of the matter and a good fight." The amendment carrying the appropriation lost by three or four votes.

I feel that the Government ought to educate the Indian in separate schools or to arrange for adequate facilities for educating him in the white schools. We advocate the education of the Indian. Every Member seems to have his own theory on this proposition. We are trying to discontinue a system that has long been in vogue and inaugurate a new one. In some instances we are taking care of the education of the Indian in Government schools, while in others trying to send him to the white schools, with the inevitable result that, with a mixed-up system of this kind, the Indian is but poorly educated, or at least is not getting the full benefit of the money expended in his behalf, and the white children alike are not receiving what they are entitled to.

What I have said with regard to schools applies alike to other improvements in the various townships, precincts, and school districts. In townships where there are a great many Indian allotments the roads are neglected, the bridges inadequate, and general improvements are poor.

In discussing this subject, the Indian question, which is an old question in this House, in a general way comes up for debate. To begin with, the Government has agreed in various treaties with the Indian to take care of his needs. He is known as the ward of the Government. The responsibility rests alone and entirely upon the Government. The Government, representing all the people, should under the circumstances be solely and entirely responsible to the Indian for his care. That responsibility should not be shifted from the shoulders of the Government to those of the few white people who happen to live in close proximity to the Indian. The responsibility should be borne by all of those comprising our great Government. The fact that a small number of white people own and live upon lands within the township or subdivision where numerous Indian allotments have been selected is no reason why they should assume the responsibility. A few shoulder the major portion of the responsibility, which in all justice rests upon all. A few are compelled to travel over poorly kept roads, live in a township or county with few and poor schools, and poorly paid teachers, while at the same time these men pay more taxes to the county, State, and school district than the man who has better facilities.

In addition to the responsibility a man owes to his family, he owes to the Government the responsibility to raise his family in such a manner as to make of them citizens who will be a credit to it. The Government, on the other hand, has responsibilities to its citizens, one of which is equity of taxation among and upon its members. The contractual responsibility to the Indian embodied in the various treaties should be shared equally by all and should not be shifted so as to be borne principally by those who happen to live in certain localities. My opinion of the matter is that it is high time for us to determine whether we will educate the Indian in the white schools or in the Indians' school. The present "50-50" proposition is not conducive to the best interests of the Indians or the whites. Let us take one horn of the dilemma.

In my bill I propose that the Indian allotments be valued, and that, in lieu of taxes, the Government pay a sum equal to the taxes paid upon like property owned by whites. In that way every member of the Government shoulders his portion of the governmental responsibility. It would be of great benefit to the Indians and alike to the whites. To say the least of it, it would be an equitable distribution of the responsibility; but as it now stands, in a great many places not only do a few of the mature assume the burden of the entire people but the school children are adversely affected by this inequitable situation, and under no circumstances should they be called upon to suffer because of a responsibility which all the people assumed in the various contracts or treaties made between the Government and the Indians.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to my colleague from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on last Thursday, March 2, in this Chamber the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], speaking no doubt as the chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, delivered a speech in which he gave a glowing account of what he termed the accomplishments of the Republican administration. Prepared and delivered as a campaign document for use in the congressional elections, it may be regarded as the official pronouncement of the Republican political organization. On the buoyant bosom of that river of dreams float Republican hopes for success in the election this fall. In its fine phrases can be heard the plea of the mendicant for votes, and wrapped up in its partisan platitudes is the anxious appeal of a desperate and perplexed party begging for two more years of public patience and forbearance. [Laughter.]

The fervid orator, as he stood on this floor, pointed with pride to the emergency tariff act as a monumental accomplishment. Through the magic of that measure the rehabilitation of agriculture had been hastened and much progress made along the road of national rehabilitation. How vain, gentlemen, how empty is that boast revealed when we consult the real facts of the operation of that piece of legislative quackery! Now, we all know that in an effort to delude the farmer, in an effort to commit the agriculturists of the United States to the Republican protective tariff theory, this measure which levied a duty of 35 cents per bushel on wheat, 15 cents per bushel on corn, 20 cents a gallon on cottonseed oil and some other vegetable oils, 26 cents a gallon on peanut oil, 30 per cent ad valorem on cattle, $2 per head on sheep, and 15 cents per pound on unwashed wool, was enacted by the Republicans and became effective on the 27th day of May, 1921.

Those duties were levied because the Republican politicians were trying to make the farmer believe that if imports of agricultural products could be taxed at the customhouse, by the operation of law, the price of his products would be increased and prosperity would be assured.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for just a very short question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In order to make the RECORD entirely accurate, will not the gentleman say that some Texas Members who are Democrats voted for that measure?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not deny that. I shall answer the gentleman. The gentleman from Kansas is never so sure that he is right as when he finds some Democrat from Texas voting with him. [Laughter and applause.] I will say to the gentleman that there were some Members of the Texas and other delegations who are Democrats who were so desperate, so anxious to do something for agriculture, knowing that the Republican Party was in control, knowing that it was only through your party that any relief could be granted, knowing that you would propose nothing else, grasped at that straw and voted for the emergency tariff. But deep down in their hearts, if they had taken counsel of the past, they would have known that your political nostrum could not have been of any substantial benefit to the agricultural interests of this Nation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; I regret I can not yield any more. I have only 30 minutes. When I get along a little further I shall yield again. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman from Kansas, because I realize that he is one of the outstanding agricultural figures in this body. He is successful each two years in cultivating the farmers, even more assiduously than they cultivate the soil. [Laughter and applause.]

But what in fact did the emergency tariff do for the agricultural interests? To what dizzy heights did agricultural prices soar on its powerful pinions? Where is the hoarded gold touched by this modern Midas and brought into the farmers' treasury? Let us see what are the statistics.

I want to say that in quoting these figures and statistics I quote the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, of which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] was chairman. With information from these sources I want to call the attention of the country and of this House to the real operation of the Fordney emergency tariff.

The Bureau of Markets and Crop Estimates reports that for May, 1921, the month in which the cry of despair went up, the month in which the Republicans proposed the remedy, No. 2 red wheat was selling in Chicago at $1.67 a bushel. It declined in June to $1.47, and in December it went to the low point of $1.18 per bushel, from the point of $1.67, with a 35 cents per bushel duty.

And what else do we find? We find that the department reports disclose that for that entire time, with one exception, the export price of wheat was greater than the domestic price. It discloses that the price of wheat going out of the United States was greater than the price of wheat sold within the United States. It discloses that the markets in Great Britain were always higher than the domestic markets within the United States. It simply disclosed what we have always said, that for the farmers' surplus products over and above what is consumed within the United States, the export market fixes the domestic price. You can not fix it by any political or legislative legerdemain, as was sought to be done in the farmers' emergency tariff. It may be worth while to refer to other data showing the prices for wheat for each month since May, 1921, at Chicago, under the tariff, in comparison with prices for the year previous without a tariff, and in comparison with British prices.

At Chicago in June, 1921, No. 2 red winter was worth $1.47 per bushel, against $2.89 for the same month in 1920. In Great Britain for June, 1921, wheat was selling at $1.72, against $1.47 at Chicago.

July, 1921, found it at $1.24 at Chicago, against $2.59 in 1920. In July, 1921, it was $1.58 in Great Britain, against $1.24 at Chicago.

In August, 1921, the market at Chicago was $1.22, against $2.50 for 1920, and in Great Britain in August, 1921, it was $1.48, against $1.22 at Chicago.

In September, 1921, the price was $1.29 at Chicago, against $2.53 for 1920. In September, 1921, it was $1.47 in Great Britain, against $1.29 in Chicago.

October, 1921, found it at $1.18 at Chicago, against $2.20 for 1920. In Great Britain in October, 1921, it was $1.21, against $1.18 at Chicago.

For November, 1921, it was $1.23 at Chicago, against $2.01 for 1920. In Great Britain it was $1.17, against $1.23 at Chicago.

In December, 1921, it was $1.18 at Chicago, against $2.02 for 1920. In December, 1921, it was $1.32 in Great Britain, against $1.18 at Chicago.

In January, 1922, the Chicago market was $1.21, and for February it was $1.34.

From a table prepared by the Department of Commerce these facts are made to appear: In June, 1921, the farm price of wheat in the United States was $1.27, against an export price of $1.58; for July, $1.12 against $1.50; for August, $1.048 against $1.40; for September, $1.01 against $1.34; for October, $1.06 against $1.30; for November, $0.94 against $1.18; for December, $0.929 against $1.21. The foreign market, the export market, the free world market, was always higher than the domestic market, and the domestic market itself declined from May, 1921, until it went as low as $1.18 in December, 1921, after seven months of the operation of the emergency tariff. In January of the present year—January, 1922—the Chicago wheat market was only $1.21, and for February it was only $1.34. In these instances it rose because the world market rose first.

I hold in my hand an Associated Press report dated at Chicago February 14, 1922, detailing a sensational rise in the wheat market of 6½ cents. This report stated that wheat had risen 6½ cents a bushel at Chicago. Why? "The reason was the sensational advance of Liverpool and other foreign market centers over yesterday's holiday," says the dispatch. This morning's Washington Post carried the following:

CHICAGO GRAIN.

CHICAGO, March 6.

Export buying of United States wheat, together with an unexpected advance of prices at Buenos Aires, led to substantial gains here to-day in the value of wheat.

Well, if it did not help wheat, surely it helped corn in Iowa and Kansas. Let us see what it did for corn. Corn carried a duty of 15 cents a bushel. In June, 1921, the price at Chicago was 62 cents under the tariff as against $1.89 for the year preceding without a tariff, the year 1920. When it was 62 cents in Chicago it was 97 cents in Great Britain. Its performance was like that of wheat.

In July, 1921, it was 60 cents at Chicago against $1.58 in 1920. When 60 cents at Chicago it was 98 cents in Great Britain.

In August, 1921, it was 56 cents against $1.58 for 1920. When it was 56 cents in Chicago it was 93 cents in Great Britain.

September, 1921, it was 53 cents against $1.31 for 1920. When it was 53 cents in Chicago it was 82 cents in Great Britain.

In October, 1921, it was 45 cents against 91 cents for 1920. When it was 45 cents in Chicago it was 71 cents in Great Britain.

In November, 1921, it was 47 cents against 77 cents in 1920. When it was 47 cents in Chicago it was 74 cents in Great Britain.

In December, 1921, it was 47 cents against 74 cents for 1920. When it was 47 cents in Chicago it was 86 cents in Great Britain.

By a table prepared by the Department of Commerce it is shown that the farm prices of corn in the United States for 1921 compared with the export prices were as follows: June, $0.625 against $0.743; for July, $0.622 against $0.71; August, $0.617 against $0.64; September, $0.562 against $0.60; October, $0.51 against $0.595; November, $0.411 against $0.612; December, $0.423 against $0.635.

When in December, 1921, corn was 47 cents in Chicago it was 86 cents in the British foreign market. These instances, gentlemen of the House, simply disclose the fact that the prices of surplus agricultural products of the United States are fixed in the markets of the world. They are not fixed by tariff tinkering with importations. The United States is a great exporter of wheat and the foreign market will always continue the free market, and that free foreign market will continue to fix the domestic price of wheat, because if a purchaser wants to buy wheat or corn in the United States he will not buy except at a price less than is offered for it at the seaboard. Whenever wheat stops going abroad the price drops at home, because the domestic surplus naturally reduces the price.

Now, let us see about some of the other articles. They tried to delude some of us into the belief that if there be levied a tariff on cottonseed oil it would immediately raise the price of cotton seed. So they levied a tariff on a great number of vegetable oils. What happened? Cottonseed oil was provided with a duty of 20 cents a gallon, and from May, 1921, to January of the present year it increased in the New York market from $0.0713 to $0.0865 per pound, or a little over 20 per cent, but cotton seed, out of which the oil is manufactured and upon which there was not levied a cent of duty, increased for the same time from $20 to $35.50 per ton at Memphis—not 20 per cent, but an increase of over 75 per cent on the free markets of the world.

The following are the farm prices for cotton seed per pound, compared with the export prices as reported by the Department of Commerce for the last seven months of 1921: June, $0.009 against $0.037; July, $0.009 against $0.017; August, $0.011 against $0.019; September, $0.014; October, $0.015 against $0.026; November, $0.015 against $0.021; December, $0.014 against $0.054.

The market quotations further show that during all the period the British market for cottonseed oil and the market for cotton seed were always higher than the domestic market.

In June, 1921, cotton seed was $18.50 per ton at New Orleans, against $41.87 for Egyptian spot cotton seed in the British market; in July, $22.50 against $49.17; in November, $37 against $47.94; and in December, $36 against $54.56.

The following were the export prices of cottonseed oil for the last seven months of 1921: June, $0.078; July, $0.077; August, $0.092; September, $0.092; October, $0.093; November, $0.089; December, $0.084.

And the British market was: For June, 1921, $0.072 to $0.0827; July, $0.0776 to $0.0887; August, $0.0852 to $0.0946; September, $0.0834 to $0.0956; October, $0.0971 to $0.1067; November, $0.0869 to $0.0934; December, $0.0811 to $0.0904.

The domestic market did not lead but followed the foreign markets.

Peanuts carried a duty of 3 cents per pound and peanut oil one of 26 cents a gallon. Surely peanuts must have gone skyward. In June, 1921, the domestic price per pound was $0.038, but the export price was $0.063; for July, $0.038 against $0.071; August, $0.039 against $0.061; September, $0.04 against $0.063; October, $0.04 against $0.063; November, $0.037 against $0.074; and December, $0.035 against $0.058.

At no time was the advance more than two-tenths of a cent over the June price, and December found them three-tenths of a cent lower. The price for foreign export was always much higher than the home price. Virginia Jumbo cleaned peanuts in the New York market in May, 1921, were $0.115 per pound. In January, 1922, they had declined to $0.093 and to $0.088 in February. The simple truth is that the United States before the war and since the war exported more vegetable oils than she imported, and the foreign market fixes the price at home.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Can the gentleman assure us by any information he may have at hand that if the emergency tariff had not been enacted the prices would not have gone lower than they did?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, I would prefer not to speculate on that now. I have not quite got to the object of the emergency tariff. The real object of the emergency tariff was not to raise the price of agricultural products. As a price for getting the agricultural schedules in that bill, what did the Republican Ways and Means Committee demand at the hands of the farmers? They demanded that there should be written into it an embargo on dyes, and they demanded as the price for the alluring bait that they held out the insertion in the tariff bill of an antidumping clause, which prohibits in a large measure the importation of foreign merchandise into the United States on the theory that it was being brought here at a price less than the cost of production.

Mr. SNYDER. One other suggestion: Does the gentleman realize that when the emergency tariff was enacted we were at the crisis of our speed of deflation, and the gentleman does not know, nor anyone else know, how far we would have gone if the emergency bill had not been enacted?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. How far would they have gone?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not know, and neither does the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have not pretended to know; I only know that the legislative concoction prescribed by the political doctors on the Republican side of the House when administered did not improve the patient. [Laughter.] You said it was done to improve and cure the sick, and now because the patient has not already died the gentleman wants to believe that but for the administration of this medicine he would have died.

Mr. SNYDER rose.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not yield again, because my time is limited and there are other phases I want to talk about. When I have time I am always very glad to yield to the gentleman, because he generally contributes enlightenment to the debate.

A little while ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] wanted to know if the prices of agricultural products would not have declined to still lower levels if the tariff had not been imposed. It is difficult to see how that could have occurred, because the export prices, the prices in foreign markets, were higher than domestic prices, and prevented home prices from going lower. Foreign prices held home prices up instead of driving them down. This is true, although whatever imports were shut out of the United States were forced upon the foreign market.

On the other hand, if deflation, the decline of European exchange, and the collapse of European markets caused prices to decline, the cure should have been applied to the cause.

What else do we find? We find, as I have already said, that the object in passing the emergency tariff legislation was to make it harder to import European merchandise and manufactured goods, because it was said that they were being brought in at a price less than the cost of production. The Agricultural Commission has reported that the crop of 1920 was sold at less than the cost of production; and if so, was it a crime that the farmer should have been able to exchange some of his goods, sold for less than the cost of production, for a few manufactured goods that were sold for less than the cost of production? Money is a relative value. If all of us go down together, we all sustain the same relative position, but if by law you pull up the manufacturer and the industries, you also by the same act let the farmer down toward the bottom of the scale.

How about wool? I may say here that wool is one agricultural product that in normal times would benefit by a tariff. A tariff in ordinary times would without doubt raise the price of wool, because we do not normally produce as much as we consume, but at the time the emergency tariff was enacted, and for some time thereafter, it did not benefit the woolgrower, and the figures disclose that fact.

What happened to wool? The report of the Agricultural Commission discloses that at the time of the passage of the emergency tariff law there were 4,000,000,000 pounds of wool in the world, and that the normal supply of wool was only 2,000,000,000 pounds. In other words, the world had more than twice as much on hand as it normally had, and until that surplus was somewhat reduced the world's price of wool was going to remain low. The Department of Commerce reports that the farm prices for wool in the United States were $0.154 in June, 1921, as against $0.232 for export; July, $0.155 against $0.216; August, $0.154 against $0.213; September, $0.155 against $0.24; October, $0.158 against $0.224; November, $0.156 against $0.212; December, $0.169 against $0.184.

The figures disclose that even during the operation of the emergency tariff act the export prices on wool were always higher than the domestic price. The domestic price of wool varied from about 15.5 cents until it rose to 16.9 cents, I believe in December, and wool is up some at the present time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What does the gentleman mean by "some"?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not find the exact figures. It is up over what it was in December.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is over 40 cents a pound to-day.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. As I have already pointed out, a tariff will eventually raise the price of wool when stocks are reduced. The gentleman will not dispute the fact, however, that wool was much lower during the last six months of 1921, with his tariff, than it was the first six months without a tariff. The world price had declined.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At the time the emergency tariff act was passed there was no market for wool, and now it is worth over 40 cents a pound.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the emergency tariff act made it 40 cents a pound in February and March, 1922, why did not the gentleman's bill make it rise at least 1 cent in May or June, or July or August, 1921, when the emergency tariff act went into operation? In the hands of the farmer it rose only one-fifth of a cent from June to November.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will answer the gentleman very briefly by saying that at that time the importations under the Underwood law had been so enormous that it took some time before the market was affected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman seems to contradict himself. He said a moment ago there was not any market for wool at that time; there was practically no market—no world market—for wool. Our tariff laws do not operate beyond our boundaries, and the 4,000,000,000 pounds of wool in the world were neither increased nor decreased by the Underwood Tariff Act, and the gentleman ought to know that.

The agricultural commission made a careful study of the situation. I quote from its report on page 112:

> Most of the Governments engaged in the war had built up large surplus stocks of wool in anticipation of war demands, and with the decline of this demand consumption rapidly fell the world over. This, coupled with the surplus stocks which came on the market in 1920, was without doubt the major factor in inducing the rapid and disastrous decline in wool prices which occurred the last half of 1920 and the first half of 1921.
> The peak of consumption of wool in the United States was reached in January, 1920, since which time it has steadily declined. This decline in consumption was doubtless a factor in reducing the price, although the enormous surplus stock of wool in this country as well as in the world was the major factor in bringing about that result.

The tremendous war surplus is shrinking. Wool has gone up the world over in recent months. It rose in the foreign markets before it rose here. The prices quoted by me were farm prices received by the producer. The quotation by the gentleman from Ohio is doubtless the Boston market for wool after it reached the hands of the wool merchant and the speculator.

Sheep over 1 year old carried a duty of $2 per head and $1 on less than 1 year old. How much did it help the price? The Department of Commerce says the farm price of sheep per hundred pounds was as follows: June, 1921, $4.74; July, $4.34; August, $4.38; September, $4.11; October, $3.96; November, $3.84; and December, $4.10. Sheep were selling for less in December, 1921, than in June of the same year. At Chicago sheep in May, 1921, were worth $6.33, but declined to $4.92 in December, 1921. Sheep now are much higher. No doubt the rise in wool is reflected in sheep.

With a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem, how did cattle fare? The farm price of cattle per hundred pounds varied, as follows: June, 1921, $5.65; July, $5.40; August, $5.39; September, $4.98; October, $4.81; November, $4.67; December, $4.62. Cattle were selling for $1 per hundred pounds less in December, 1921, than in June of the same year, when the act first became effective. The Department of Agriculture reports that beef cattle at Chicago were $8.33 in May, 1921, and $7.12 in January, 1922, and $7.60 in February.

If the emergency tariff did not enhance farm prices measured in dollars, what was its effect? As I have said, money is a relative thing. It is only valuable in that it represents a purchasing power measured in other commodities.

The Joint Commission of Agriculture, composed of five Senators and five Members of the House, in its report says:

> Measured in terms of purchasing power, the farmers' dollar in 1920 was worth 89 cents. In May, 1921, it was worth 77 cents. During the past 12 months it has been worth less than in any preceding 12 months in 30 years.

It also states that a bushel of corn in 1921, measured in other commodities, would only purchase 59 per cent of what it would for the five-year average before the war; wheat, 78 per cent; cotton, 48 per cent; cotton seed, 48 per cent; beef cattle, 71 per cent; sheep, 64 per cent; wool, 63 per cent; and the average of 31 farm products, 67 per cent.

What was a farmer's dollar worth in other goods—not in money? The commission discloses that in 1921 a dollar received by the farmer for his agricultural products was worth a dollar anywhere in the world, of course, because gold is standard, but in 1921 a dollar's worth of agricultural products, measured by the average for five years preceding the war, was worth only 67 cents.

What does it mean? It means that the products of the farmer which are worth a dollar in gold in the market of the world, when measured in the United States domestic market, tariff protected, is only worth 67 cents in other goods. It means that an artificial market has been maintained here for manufactured goods at the expense of the farmer. That same table discloses that corn which is worth a dollar in the markets of the world in other goods of the United States is only worth 59 cents, measured by the standard of the five years preceding the war. It shows that cotton, although it is worth a gold dollar in the markets of the world, when measured in the domestic market in the United States in other goods which the farmer has to buy is only worth 48 cents. What does it mean? Does it mean that the farmer's labor is lighter or that his hours are shorter? No. It means that he must sell in a free world market and must buy in a tariff-protected market. It means that he must take what he can get—what the foreign market forces the domestic buyer to pay—and that he must buy in a highly organized domestic market, in which foreign goods are not allowed to compete.

The report also contains a table showing the average annual earnings of employees normally engaged in different industries; for 1909 average of all industries $622, against $302 for agriculture; for 1910, $656 against $301; for 1911, $648 against $317; for 1912, $692 against $319; for 1913, $723 against $328; and for 1918, $1,094 against $590. It is said that though about 30 per cent of the persons gainfully employed in the United States are engaged in agriculture, normally they received only about 17 or 18 per cent of the national income. These things, gentlemen, go to the very heart of the whole economic situation. These things disclose that the protective tariff principle of the Republican Party is responsible for building up an artificial stimulation for the manufactured products of the land and for the industries of this country at the expense of agricultural interests and the consuming public. But the tariff is the Republican cure-all. It has been its standard prescription from the beginning. Once there was a school of medicine that invariably prescribed bleeding, whatever the disease or condition of the patient. With lancet and cup, these cruel surgeons weakened their victims while professing to coax them back to health and strength. This political doctor, like the leech of old, prescribes bleeding for sick agriculture and is preparing now a permanent tariff bill for his weakened and debilitated patient. In the tariff laboratories he is sharpening the knife and preparing the anesthetic for another operation. You need not doubt when the American valuation clause is tacked on the tariff bill, or some substitute as unjust and inequitable, but that the agricultural interests and consuming public of the country will know that they have had a prescription of heroic proportions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that is what they are fixing to do. That is their chief treatment. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said on the floor here, when sponsoring the permanent tariff bill through this body, when asked some question, I think by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], as to what the Republicans were going to do to improve the conditions under which the country was suffering, held aloft the ponderous Fordney tariff bill and, in effect, said, "Here is our remedy for all ills and conditions." That is the Republican doctrine.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] the other day in making a catalogue of the accomplishments of the Republican Party did not point out that the emergency act contained the antidumping clause, which, in fact, shuts off the foreign market for the product of the farmer. The trouble with the farmer was he had no foreign market. The antidumping clause tended to shut out importation and hurt his market in foreign countries. Another trouble was that he had to buy in the domestic market, whereas his product is fixed in the market of the world, and at one fell swoop you injure the foreign market, where he sells, and protect the home market, in which he buys.

Gentlemen, these permanent tariff restrictions are being compounded in the face of the fact that Europe owes us $11,000,000,000 in gold, and has no gold with which to pay and can only pay in goods. The Republican Party is preparing to build up a barrier to shut out those goods, and whenever that time comes that $11,000,000,000 of debt must remain a debt.

Why is a protective tariff levied? What is the purpose of it? The purpose of it is to raise the price. Raise the price to whom? To the man who buys. Where? To raise the price in the United States. Raise the price in the domestic market, make it cost more for the consumer, whether he is a farmer or whether he is a machinist or whether he is a laborer or merchant or lawyer or doctor or whatever he may be. The object of a tariff is to make it cost more to the man that buys it or wears it or toils with it in his hands. That is the object of a tariff. To tax one man and give to another, to make one man work harder and longer that another man may get more money and work less.

But, gentlemen, the picture that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] painted the other day was to him a pleasing prospect. He is marvelously endowed with the skill of the old-time photographers, who after producing a negative erased all the facial blemishes, rubbed out the wrinkles, retouched the rough places, blotted out the disfigurations with real architectural genius, until there remained a handsome, smooth picture, as pleasing as it was unlike the subject.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio said in his address that "freight rates must come down before agriculture and general business can become normal." The Commission on Agriculture, in its report, says: "In other cases commodities could not be moved at all, because the prices at the terminals would be entirely absorbed by the freight charges in transporting them"; that "no industry can survive or prosper under such conditions. An immediate reduction in freight rates is absolutely essential to anything approximating a normal return of profits for farming operations." However, although the gentleman from Ohio said freight rates must come down, the gentleman failed to point out that he and his party have done nothing whatever to reduce freight rates to where business and agriculture and commerce can live. Why did not the gentleman from Ohio decorate the list of Republican achievements with that signal performance?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out in his political panegyric of his party that the present administration is preparing to sell the great fleet of steel ships, for which the people of the United States paid $220 per ton—is preparing to sell them now on the worst and lowest market in the history of the shipping industry—for something like one-tenth of their cost. Why did not the gentleman from Ohio rise in his place and point with pride to that achievement?

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that his party and his administration have done nothing to restore foreign markets for American goods—foreign markets in which our produce and our manufactures must be sold if they are to be sold profitably.

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that the War Finance Corporation, for whose extension he took so much pride, was a Democratic accomplishment and a Democratic conception, and that its revival was urged by Democrats on this floor.

The gentleman failed to point out that during the time his party was in power unemployment has increased throughout the length of this Republic. The gentleman failed to point out that of the $818,000,000 which he claimed was lopped from the tax roll of the people $450,000,000 was lopped from the excess profits of great corporations rather than the ordinary man of the street, and that $90,000,000 more of it was cut from extremely high incomes of the land rather than from off the back of the man of moderate income or the man who works and toils with his hands.

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that the accomplishments of his administration toward world disarmament were successful only to the degree that they were patterned on the conception and inspiration of a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that economies effected through a reduction in the personnel of the Army were forced upon the Republicans by the Democrats.

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that his party has failed to inspire confidence in business or enterprise.

The gentleman from Ohio failed to point out that his party now proposes to pass an iniquitous tariff measure with an American valuation clause.

Above all other things, the gentleman from Ohio carefully and studiously declined to point out that his party and his administration had approved and confirmed an election in which $200,000 had been admittedly spent in a campaign for high office. He avoided reference to it as he would shun a foul and unclean thing. He failed to point out that his party and his administration had adopted as its own the most notorious election in the history of any State. He failed to point out that his party and his administration stand before the people of the United States as sponsors of that disgraceful example of debauchery. Why did not the gentleman from Ohio point to that scandalous thing? Was he ashamed or did he forget? No. He did not forget—nor can he forget. I must remind the gentleman from Ohio that no catalogue of Republican achievements, no list of things done, no placard of partisan performance is complete unless it sets forth in letters of scarlet that bold, that shameful, that outrageous political scandal in the State of Michigan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall take up that much of the time of the House. It is getting pretty late, and rather than impose on the House I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I further ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in 8-point type, certain statutory citations which I desire to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in 8-point type, certain citations as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL FARM LOANS ON UNITED STATES RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and I understand that the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands will call up the bill H. R. 4382 to-morrow, and inasmuch as under the Calendar Wednesday rule there can be only one hour devoted to debate on the bill on each side, obviously there will not be sufficient time to-morrow to explain this bill, and for that reason I desire to-day to explain some features of the bill, so that the membership of the House may read the RECORD in the morning and get some information regarding the bill which the time allotted to-morrow will not enable it to obtain from the debate on the floor.

The following is a copy of the bill:

A bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the purposes of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and known as and called the reclamation law, the Secretary of the Interior may enter into contract with any legally organized irrigation district whereby such irrigation district shall agree to pay the moneys required to be paid to the United States, and in such event water-right applications on the part of landowners and entrymen, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be dispensed with. In the event of such contract being made with an irrigation district the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may contract that the payments, both for the construction of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, on the part of the district shall be made upon such dates as will best conform to the district and taxation laws of the respective States under which such irrigation districts shall be formed, and if he deem it advisable he may contract for such penalties or interest charges in case of delinquency in payments as he may deem proper and consistent with such State laws, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6 of the reclamation extension act approved August 13, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 686). The Secretary of the Interior may accept a partial payment of the amount due from any district to the United States, providing such acceptance shall not constitute a waiver of the balance remaining due nor the interest or penalties, if any, accruing upon said balance: Provided, That no contract with an irrigation district under this act shall be binding on the United States until the proceedings on the part of the district for the authorization of the execution of the contract with the United States shall have been confirmed by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, or pending appellate action if ground for appeal be laid.

SEC. 2. That patents and water-right certificates which shall hereafter be issued under the terms of the act entitled "An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1912 (37 Stats. L., p. 265), for lands lying within any irrigation district with which the United States shall have contracted, by which the irrigation district agrees to make the payment of all charges for the building of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, shall not reserve to the United States a lien for the payment of such charges; and where such a lien shall have been reserved in any patent or water-right certificate issued under the said act of Congress, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered to release such lien in such manner and form as may be deemed effective; and the Secretary of the Interior is further empowered to release liens in favor of the United States contained in water-right applications and to assent to the release of liens to secure reimbursement of moneys due to the United States pursuant to water-right applications running in favor of the water users' association and contained in stock subscription contracts to such associations, when the lands covered by such liens shall be subject to assessment and levy for the collection of all moneys due and to become due to the United States by irrigation districts formed pursuant to State law and with which the United States shall have entered into contract therefor: Provided, That no such lien so reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate shall be released until the owner of the land covered by the lien shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection by such irrigation district of taxes against said land for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation: Provided further, That before any lien is released under this act the Secretary of the Interior shall file a written report finding that the contracting irrigation district is legally organized under the laws of the State in which its lands are located, with full power to enter into the contract and to collect by assessment and levy against the lands of the district the amount of the contract obligation.

SEC. 3. That upon the execution of any contract between the United States and any irrigation district pursuant to this act the public lands included within such irrigation district, when subject to entry, and entered lands within such irrigation district, for which no final certificates shall have been issued and which may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior in said contract, shall be subject to all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to promote the reclamation of arid lands," approved August 11, 1916: Provided, That no map or plan as required by section 3 of the said act need be filed by the irrigation district for approval by the Secretary of the Interior.

This bill, H. R. 4382, is a bill which will not only give the Government better security than it now has under the reclamation law for governmental expenditures, but in addition to that it will enable the farmers upon Government reclamation projects to obtain farm loans which now they are unable to obtain.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Do you mean from the Federal Farm Loan Board?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; from the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Mr. GARNER. While I am on my feet, I would like to ask the gentleman what the prospects are of passing the so-called western reclamation act, carrying $250,000,000 for the next 10 years?

Mr. SINNOTT. I am unable to say what the prospects are for the passage of that bill, but I hope for its passage.

Mr. Chairman, farmers on Government reclamation projects labor under a great handicap because they can not secure loans under the Federal farm loan act. The reason they can not secure these loans is because under section 12 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, it is provided:

SEC. 12. That no Federal land bank organized under this act shall make loans except upon the following terms and conditions:

1. Said loans shall be secured by duly recorded first mortgages on farm land within the land bank district in which the bank is situated.

Section 2 of said Federal farm loan act provides:

SEC. 2. That wherever the term "first mortgage" is used in this act it shall be held to include such classes of first liens on farm lands as shall be approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board, and the credit instruments secured thereby.

Farmers on Government reclamation projects can not comply with the provisions of said sections 12 and 2 of the Federal farm loan act, because they can not give a first-lien mortgage upon their farms for the reason that the Government, under the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of the act approved August 9, 1912, Thirty-seventh Statutes, 264, reserves a first lien. The pertinent provisions of section 2 of said act are as follows:

That every patent and water-right certificate issued under this act shall expressly reserve to the United States a prior lien on the land patented or for which water right is certified, together with all water rights appurtenant or belonging thereto, superior to all other liens, claims, or demands whatsoever for the payment of all sums due or to become due to the United States or its successors in control of the irrigation project in connection with such lands and water rights.

SEC. 3. That upon full and final payment being made of all amounts due on account of the building and betterment charges to the United States or its successors in control of the project, the United States or its successors, as the case may be, shall issue upon request a certificate certifying that payment of the building and betterment charges in full has been made and that the lien upon the land has been so far satisfied and is no longer of any force or effect except the lien for annual charges for operation and maintenance.

The Federal Farm Loan Board's opinion on this subject, printed in the report on H. R. 4382, is as follows:

Board is unanimously of the opinion that loans can not be made on lands under reclamation projects where Government reserves lien in patent and such lien remains unsatisfied. We distinguish between above cases and those projects where irrigation charge is a fixed annual assessment and collected as taxes, complete title being in borrower. * * * Where the water assessment is merely a fixed annual charge, collectible as taxes, and the borrower's legal title is unimpaired, we feel that loans can be made, the question in this instance to consider being the effect of the assessment on the borrower's net earning power. Where the title reserves a specific lien for a specific amount, clearly the borrower does not have such title as enables him to give a first mortgage, construing the term first mortgage, as we must, to mean a paramount lien.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why can not the man who has the land borrow and discharge the lien of the United States, just as he discharges the first mortgage and gets out of the lien, and get his title clear?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, the construction charges run over a period of 20 years. Then when the settler receives his patent for the land the patent reserves a lien for the Government not only for the construction charge but for the future yearly operation and maintenance charges.

Mr. STEVENSON. But as I understand that opinion which the gentleman just read, that charge will be treated as taxes and not as a lien.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under the United States reclamation law they are not so treated, but will be so treated as taxes provided we pass this bill. This bill meets the objection of the Federal Farm Loan Board. The Federal Farm Loan Board in its decision is really speaking of the ordinary irrigation district project, disconnected from and dissociated with the Government reclamation project which retains the annual lien. Loans are made on lands in such an irrigation district. Now, the proposition of the Federal Farm Loan Board is that the irrigation project, disconnected with the Government irrigation project, although it may bond itself, those bonds are paid by yearly assessments which are collected just the same as taxes are collected. Now, they say that such obligations are not liens that militate against the Federal farm loan banks granting a mortgage.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then what does the bill that you speak of propose as to relieving the situation?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will insert in the RECORD a letter that I have received from J. F. McNaught, president of the Hermiston irrigation district, inclosing a letter from the president—D. G. O'Shea—of the Federal farm loan bank at Spokane, Wash., showing why loans can not be made to the farmers on the irrigation district upon the Umatilla project:

HERMISTON IRRIGATION DISTRICT,
Hermiston, Oreg., January 30, 1922.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SINNOTT: I am inclosing herewith copy of letter received by Mr. S. C. Lochrie, cashier of the First National Bank of Hermiston. Mr. D. G. O'Shea, president of the Federal land bank at Spokane, has stated the case very succinctly. This is in answer to Mr. Lochrie's letter accompanying the application for a Federal loan of a farmer residing on this project, and is self-explanatory. You will recall that all lands in reclamation projects going to patent since the passage of the act of August 9, 1912, are by the terms of the patent made subject to a Government lien for the unpaid portion of the construction charge. The application which Mr. Lochrie sent to the Federal bank, perfect in every other respect, was sent in as a test case to ascertain definitely what the bank would do in such cases.

I beg to advise you that fully one-half of the lands in this project fall within that category, and I assume the situation is similar in other projects. I beg to further advise you that about two years ago the water users of this project were induced to form and enter into an irrigation district under the State law, and to enter into a contract with the Government in which the district obligated itself to pay all claims of the Government against the individual landowners, and the Government agreed to, and did, cancel all liens against said lands except the liens created by the said act of August 9, 1912, and that it was represented at the time of the execution of that contract that immediate steps would be taken to secure the repeal of said act and to secure the release of the lands which had heretofore gone to patent from the liens.

As further security goes, this provision in the patent is like the fifth wheel to a carriage, superfluous, as the district is bound to pay all Government claims against the lands whether they went to patent before or after the passage of the act of August 9, 1912. Under the conditions that prevail, where a district has been formed and a contract has been entered into, as set forth above, the act in question creates an unjust discrimination and precludes the owners of one-half of the lands from securing much-needed Federal loans, a right which they are rightfully entitled to.

Can we not look to you to introduce and foster a bill repealing this now unjust law? We suggest that the repealing act should be so worded as to release all lands from the lien heretofore created by the provisions of the original act. We are sending a copy of this letter to Secretary Fall, Senator MCNARY, and Director Davis, asking them to support the measure.

Very truly, yours,
J. F. MCNAUGHT,
President Hermiston Irrigation District.

Mr. S. C. LOCHRIE,
Hermiston, Oreg.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant having reference to former correspondence on the matter of the consideration of applications for loans by farmers under a Government reclamation project on lands to which patent contains the reservation provided for under the act of Congress approved August 9, 1912.

We have read same and have noted the case set forth in the patent submitted by you for consideration.

We return the patent herewith.

In your letter of the 11th instant you stated as follows: "In our particular case we have many farmers whose lands have been patented since 1912, but at the same time their liens have been released by the United States Reclamation Service and the Umatilla River Water Users' Association." That is a pretty straight statement of a thing we thought could not be done, and we asked you to furnish us a record of a specific case, and we expressed also the thought that no public officer would execute a satisfaction of a lien unless authorized and empowered so to do. The abstract of title on page 2 thereof referred to by you shows record of patent from the Government to Mr. Carl Vertner, which patent is issued under the provisions of the act of August 9, 1912, and it contains a specific lien prior and superior to all and other liens, etc., to secure payment to the Government for the sums due and to become due for water furnished. The release of water lien shown on pages 17 and 18 of the abstract executed by the Acting Secretary of the Interior and for the Government satisfies the liens mentioned therein, but it clearly and specifically does not release or attempt to release the liens reserved to the United States in connection with patents issued under the act of August 9, 1912. We have marked with red pencil the particular clause in the release which excepts from the provisions of the release liens reserved in patents as aforesaid, wherefore the statement in your letter of the 11th that the liens had been released is not correct, for the liens reserved in the patents have not been released.

We will again say, where a lien has been reserved in the patent from the Government for irrigation construction charges we know of no way in which same can be satisfied except by payment of the construction charges in full; that it would not be considered advisable for the farmer to pay off a noninterest-bearing lien of the kind; and the Federal land bank under the law would not be authorized and can not make loans on lands the patents to which contain the reservation mentioned until such reservation be satisfied.

Yours, very truly,
D. G. O'SHEA, President.

The bill H. R. 4382 proposes that the Secretary of the Interior may enter into a contract with the irrigation district, which is a corporate entity. The moment that contract is entered into with the irrigation district all the lands of the irrigation district by operation of law become liable for the payment of the expenditures made by the Government. Now, that liability is not the technical lien referred to in the Federal farm loan act. In other words, that obligation on the part of the irrigation district will not prevent the Federal farm loan banks from making the necessary loans to the farmers upon the irrigation project, because under the laws of the various Western States the amount due the Government will be collected by annual assessments just the same as the ordinary county or city or municipal taxes are collected.

Mr. STEVENSON. And the debt that is due the Government, then, will just simply bear the same relation to the land in that irrigation district that the bonded debt of a county bears to the lands in the county?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; and it will really give the Government a better security for its expenditures than the Government has to-day. The security for the Government expenditures to-day is a lien upon each individual tract, upon each individual fund. Now, under the proposition contained in H. R. 4382 the Government will substantially have a lien upon every acre of the land in the district as a whole for the entire governmental expenditure. Suppose that on an irrigation project to-day some one's land becomes water-logged and thereby becomes worthless and irreclaimable. In that event the Government loses its investment in that particular tract of land; but under the operation of this bill the Government would not lose its expenditure in that particular tract of land, because the entire obligation is assumed by the entire district. Now, I have prepared a synopsis of the Oregon irrigation district laws regarding these contracts of irrigation districts with the United States, which I shall insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SYNOPSIS OF OREGON IRRIGATION DISTRICT LAWS REGARDING CONTRACT OF IRRIGATION DISTRICTS WITH THE UNITED STATES—FROM OLSON CODE.

"Section 7305 authorizes 50 or a majority of the owners of land irrigated or susceptible of irrigation to petition the county court to organize an irrigation district for the construction of irrigation works 'or for the assumption as principal or guarantor of indebtedness on account of district lands to the United States under the Federal reclamation laws.'

"Section 7308 authorizes the county court to declare the district duly organized when three-fifths of the votes cast are in favor of the district.

"Section 7309 provides 'that in case any district organized under this act is appointed fiscal agent of the United States or by the United States is authorized to make collections of moneys for and on behalf of the United States in connection with any Federal reclamation project, the treasurer and each director shall execute a further and additional official bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Interior may require, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties as fiscal or other agent of the United States under any such appointment or authorization.'

"Section 7316 provides 'that any water the right to use of which is acquired by the district under any contract with the United States shall be distributed and apportioned by the district in accordance with the acts of Congress, and rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, and the provisions of said contract in relation thereto.'

"SEC. 7322. District may contract with the United States: For the purpose of acquiring control over Government land within the district and of complying with the provisions of the act of Congress entitled 'An act to promote reclamation of arid lands,' approved August 11, 1916, the board shall have authority to make such investigations, and based thereon, such representations and assurances to the Secretary of the Interior as may be requisite; and said board may enter into any obligation or contract with the United States for the construction, operation, and maintenance of the necessary works for the delivery and distribution of water therefrom under the provisions of the Federal reclamation act and all acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto and the rules and regulations established thereunder, and may contract for the refusal of water service to any lands which are in default in the payment of any assessment levied to carry out any contract between the district and the United States, or for the assumption, as principal or guarantor, of indebtedness to the United States on account of district lands; or the board may contract with the United States for a water supply or drainage works under any act of Congress providing for or permitting such contract, and in case contract has been or may hereafter be made with the United States as herein provided, bonds of the district may be deposited with the United States, at 90 per cent of their par value, to the amount to be paid by the district to the United States under any such contract, the interest on said bonds, if bearing interest, to be provided for by assessment and levy as in the case of other bonds of the district, and regularly paid to the United States to be applied as provided in such contract; and if the bonds of the district are not so deposited, it shall be the duty of the board of directors to include as part of any levy or assessment provided for in this act an amount sufficient to meet each year all payments accruing under the terms of any such contract; and the board may accept, on behalf of the district, appointment of the district as fiscal agent of the United States, or authorization of the district by the United States to make collections of money for or on behalf of the United States in connection with any Federal reclamation project, whereupon the district shall be authorized to so act and to assume the duties and liabilities incident to such action, and the said board shall have full power to do any and all things required by the Federal statutes now or hereafter enacted in connection therewith, and all things required by the rules and regulations now or that may hereafter be established by any department of the Federal Government in regard thereto.

"Any property acquired by the district may be conveyed to the United States in so far as the same may be needed by the United States for the construction, operation, and maintenance of works for the benefit of the district under any contract that may be entered into with the United States pursuant to this act.

"SEC. 7323. Election for bonds and contract with United States: This section provides for an election to determine 'whether the right to enter into an obligation or contract with the United States shall be authorized.' This section further provides, 'If a majority of the votes cast are "Contract with the United States—Yes," the board, acting in pursuance of said election, may negotiate and execute a contract with the United States.'

"SEC. 7324. Provides 'The contract provisions for the payment of construction charges to the United States, and the bonds securing the payment of the same, if any be issued and deposited, may be of such denominations and may call for the payment of such interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, may provide for such installments and for repayment of the principal at such times as may be required by the Federal laws and as may be agreed upon between the board and the Secretary of the Interior.'

"SEC. 7326. Bonds, how paid—Character of the obligation: Said bonds and the interest thereon and all payments due or to become due to the United States under any contract between the district and the United States, accompanying which bonds of the district have not been deposited with the United States as provided in this act, and all obligations for the payment of money authorized and incurred under this act, shall be paid by the revenue derived from the annual assessments upon the land in the district, and all the lands in the district shall be and remain liable to be assessed for such payments as herein provided and under and subject to the provisions of this act.

"In case the amount assessed against any tract of land shall not be paid the next assessment against the land in the district shall be so increased as to take care of such default. In addition to the provision for the payment of said bonds and interest by taxation and other provisions of this act, all the property of the district, including irrigation and other works, shall be liable for the indebtedness of the district, and the holder of the bonds or the United States, in case contract has been executed by the United States, may, in case of default in the payment of interest or principal on the bonds, or the amount due on the contract, upon the order of the circuit court, take possession of the irrigation and other works of the district and operate the same until the amount in default shall have been fully paid.

"Any assessment upon land shall be a lien against the property assessed, and such lien for all payments due or to become due under any contract with the United States or for the payment of principal or interest of bonds deposited with the United States shall be a preferred lien to any assessments for bonds issued subsequent to the date of such contract or the issuance of said bonds deposited with the United States, and no district assessment lien shall be removed until the assessments are paid with interest and penalties or the property sold for the payment thereof.

"SEC. 7327. Payment of coupons—Redemption of bonds: The treasurer shall keep a 'bond fund' account or a 'United States contract fund' account, or a 'bond and United States contract fund' account, as the case may be, into which shall be covered all moneys arising from the sale of refunding bonds and assessment and levy until there is sufficient money in such fund to meet the next installment of principal and interest upon bonds of the district and to meet all payments for construction and all other purposes to the United States. From said fund he shall pay moneys due as principal and interest on bonds as they shall mature and the bonds and coupons be presented and as payments to the United States shall fall due.

"SEC. 7328. Assessments: This section provides, among other things, 'that where contract has been made with the United States in addition to the amount hereinbefore determined and apportioned, the board of directors shall fix the amount payable by each tract within such district, and the amount so fixed shall be in accordance with the reclamation laws and the public notices, orders, and regulations issued thereunder, and shall be in compliance with any contract made by the United States with the owners of said lands and in compliance further with the contracts between the district and the United States, * * * and the amounts so determined, fixed, and apportioned shall constitute an assessment upon the lands of the district, * * * and the assessment and apportionment made by the board of directors as in this act provided is prima facie evidence that all of the requirements of the law in relation thereto have been complied with and that the same are liens against the property to the same extent as other taxes lawfully levied.'

"SEC. 7331. Levy of assessment and collection: This section provides for the entering of the apportionment against each land upon the county assessment roll in the same manner that other municipal assessments are entered, except that it is entered 'as the irrigation district tax against same.' This section provides that such tax shall be collected as the other taxes of the county. This act further provides 'In case of neglect or refusal of the board of directors to cause assessment and levy to be made, as in this act provided, then the assessment and levy herein provided for shall be made and equalized by the county court of the county in which the office of the board of directors is situated, sitting for the transaction of county business, in the same manner that said court levies county taxes, with like effect as the board of directors is required to make the same, and all expenses incident thereto shall be borne by such district, and such levy and assessment shall be entered on the county tax roll by the county assessor in the manner in this section provided.'

"SEC. 7339. This section provides in case a contract has been entered into by the district and the United States no change shall be made in the boundaries of the district unless the Secretary of the Interior shall assent thereto in writing.

"SEC. 7341. This section provides that the exclusion of lands from the district shall not affect, impair, or discharge any contract, obligation, lien, or charge for which the district is liable.

"SEC. 7343. This section provides in case a contract has been made between the district and the United States the board shall have no jurisdiction to consider a petition for dissolution of the district until it shall have been certified to the board of directors by the Secretary of the Interior that all payments and obligations due or to become due to the United States under such contract shall have been fully paid or that the Secretary of the Interior consents to such dissolution.

"SEC. 7354. May turn lands over to United States for development and colonization—To levy assessments to pay cost—Powers to contract: Any irrigation district organized pursuant to the laws of the State of Oregon may turn over to the Federal Government, or any agency thereof, any lands owned or controlled by said district for the purpose of having the same developed and colonized by said Federal Government, or any agency thereof, and may levy assessments for the repayment to the Federal Government, or any agency thereof, the sum expended in the development of such lands, with the interest thereon not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, and may pay such moneys over to the Federal Government, or any agency thereof, as the same is collected. Said districts may also assess such lands to cover repayment to the district of the cost, with interest thereon not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, and shall deposit the same in the 'bond fund' account, or the 'United States contract fund' account, or the 'bond and United States contract fund' account, as the case may be, and said assessments shall be in addition to the assessments which may be levied to meet the reclamation charges, interest thereon, and maintenance. Irrigation districts may enter into such contracts and assume such obligations with the Federal Government, or any agency thereof, as may be necessary, expedient, or desirable to bring about the development of the lands in said irrigation district by the Federal Government, or any agency thereof.

"SEC. 7358. This section provides for the commencement proceedings to secure a judicial determination of the regularity and legality of all the proceedings of the district including 'the regularity and legality of the authorization of contract with the United States, and as to the validity of said contract, whether or not the same shall have been executed, and whether or not bonds are to be deposited with the United States.'"

The chief counsel of the Reclamation Service, Mr. Hamele, informs me that the other Western States have irrigation district laws embracing these governmental contracts that are very similar to the Oregon irrigation district law. For that reason I am inserting only the Oregon irrigation district laws in the RECORD so that they may be studied to-morrow. I think the House will find that every contingency that may arise has been anticipated; that the interests of the Government are fully safeguarded. The Oregon irrigation district law, as well as the laws of other Western States, was really prepared by or in cooperation with the chief counsel of the Reclamation Service. They are designed really to correlate and to be linked into this bill, H. R. 4382, and I believe when Members of the House study the various provisions of the Oregon district law, which would take too much time to explain this evening, they will find that the entire matter has been very thoroughly and very carefully covered. These contracts can not be entered into unless there is a vote of the farmers in the district approving the contract. Thereafter the contract must be reviewed by the court and the court must pronounce all the proceedings of the district, the calling of the election, the election itself, and the negotiation and consummation of these negotiations with the Secretary of the Interior—all of these must be validated by the court before the contract is valid.

I shall also insert in the RECORD a memorandum prepared by the chief counsel of the Reclamation Service, Mr. Hamele, who gives further valuable information and citations regarding this bill and regarding the validity of such contracts as are proposed to be entered into between the Secretary of the Interior and the irrigation district in case this bill is passed.

The following is the memorandum of Mr. Hamele, chief counsel of the United States Reclamation Service:

Memorandum by chief counsel of the United States Reclamation Service regarding contracts between irrigation districts and the United States providing for the payment of water charges under Federal irrigation projects.

1. The irrigation district is a quasi municipal public corporation with the power to levy assessments against its lands for the payment of its obligations.

2. Congress has in a general way during the past 10 years approved the plan of making contracts between the United States and irrigation districts to provide for the payment of water charges due the United States on Federal irrigation projects. The Warren Act of February 24, 1911 (36 Stat., 925), provides for contracts with irrigation districts, and the extension act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat., 686), at section 5, authorizes the transfer of the care, operation, and maintenance of Federal irrigation projects to irrigation districts. In section 7 of the last-named act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint irrigation districts as fiscal agents on Government projects. In the Smith Act of August 11, 1916 (39 Stat., 506), public lands of the United States were made subject to the assessment and levy of irrigation districts. The sundry civil appropriation act of June 12, 1917 (40 Stat., 148), provides that no moneys shall be expended for drainage on the Rio Grande project except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of all project investments. A similar provision appears in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 1, 1918 (40 Stat., 674), and in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 19, 1919 (41 Stat., 200). In the act of July 1, 1918, Congress specifically approved an agreement by which a developed Carey Act project in Idaho, which had been organized into an irrigation district, known as the King Hill irrigation district, contracted with the United States for the further development of the project and for repayment to the United States under the irrigation district plan. The sundry civil appropriation act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat., 913), approves a further agreement with the King Hill irrigation district and also provides that no part of the appropriation made for the Boise Federal irrigation project in Idaho shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of the cost thereof.

Each of the arid States of the West, in which a Federal irrigation project is located, has passed a specific statute authorizing contracts between the United States and irrigation districts of the kind in question. These statutes are as follows:

Arizona Laws, 1921, page 324, section 1; California Laws, 1917, page 243, section 1; Colorado Laws, 1921, pages 496, 498; Idaho Laws, 1915, page 304; Idaho Laws, 1917, page 297; Montana Laws, 1915, page 360; Montana Laws, 1917, page 333; Montana Laws, 1919, page 235, section 1; Nebraska Laws, 1915, page 461, sections 1 and 2; Nebraska Laws, 1917, page 467, section 1; Nebraska Laws, 1917, page 464, section 1; Nevada Laws, 1921, page 83, section 24; New Mexico Laws, 1917, page 66, section 12; North Dakota Laws, 1917, page 157, sections 68–69; Oregon Laws, 1917, page 246, sections 1–2; South Dakota Laws, 1917, page 583, section 68; Texas Laws, 1917, page 188, section 52; Utah Laws, 1917, pages 87–97, sections 15–41; Washington Laws, 1917, page 726, section 3A; Washington Laws, 1921; page 440; Wyoming Laws, 1921, page 167, section 963.

3. In each irrigation-district contract providing for the payment of water charges to the United States the following article is inserted:

"The district as a whole is obligated to pay to the United States the full amount herein agreed upon, according to the terms stated, regardless of any individual default in the payment of any assessment levied by the district."

4. Before the United States incurs any obligation under any of these contracts the contract is submitted to a vote of the electors of the district and thereafter such election on the contract and the execution of the contract are confirmed by a proceeding in court, which is binding upon all the electors of the district. No expenditure is made by the United States under any such contract until these confirmation proceedings have been had and until time for appeal therefrom has expired. We have many contracts of this nature, and in no case has any objection to their validity been sustained by the court. Usually no objections are raised, but the validity of such contracts was expressly decided in the State of Idaho in the case of Nampa and Meridian Irrigation District v. Petrie (153 Pac., 425).

5. The State statutes referred to above, which authorize the making of such contracts, are of a generally uniform nature. A leading case upon the right of such an irrigation district to reassess lands to make up delinquencies is that of Norris v. Montezuma Valley Irrigation District (248 Fed., 369), decided in 1918 in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, eighth district. We quote the following from the opinion:

"The trial court was of the opinion that the Colorado statutes relating to irrigation districts impliedly prevented an additional levy as demanded by plaintiffs because the statute provided for taxation by special assessments to pay these bonds, that each acre was subject to only the same burden as every other acre for this purpose, and that a requirement of a new levy as prayed would impose an unequal burden on the lands on which the prior levy had been paid, as compared to those lands on which the levies remained unpaid. Undoubtedly the cost of the improvements in a local assessment district must be apportioned in some just mode according to the benefits received by the several portions of the district. (Gast Realty Co. v. Schneider Granite Co., 240 U. S., 55; 36 Sup. Ct., 254; 60 L. Ed. 523; Hagar v. Reclamation District No. 108, 111 U. S., 701, 4 Sup. Ct., 663; 28 L. Ed. 569; Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Decatur, 147 U. S., 190; 13 Sup. Ct., 293; 37 L. Ed., 132.) * * *

"The legislature is presumed to have knowledge of the fact that under any system of taxation by assessment hitherto devised a portion of the taxpayers neglect to pay the taxes levied against their property for a long period after they become due. In partial recognition of this fact these statutes provide that the county board shall increase the rate of levy on an irrigation district 15 per cent to cover delinquencies. If the objection that is made to a reassessment be carried to its logical conclusion, the regular annual assessment would be excessive in part because of the practical certainty that some taxpayers would not pay their taxes before the obligations of the district became due. Such a stout requirement of equality of collection would make a system of taxation that would be unworkable in practice. The ordinary machinery for the collection of taxes is not so perfect that it induces payment at the same time from all alike and usually large portions of taxes upon real property, and larger portions of poll and personal-property taxes are never collected. It is supposed that the interest and penalties exacted from those who delay prompt payments and the summary means of enforcement of collection will somewhat equalize the burden that falls on those who pay promptly, but any final unpaid balance is a loss that falls uniformly upon the entire body of taxpayers. It is a common provision in the State constitutions and statutes that assessments or levies for taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects or by value. Such provisions are not violated, when, after the lapse of a reasonable time and after reasonable efforts have been made to collect the first levy, an additional levy is made upon all the property in the district because of the failure of some of the taxpayers to pay their portion of the first levy. (State v. Common Council, 15 Wis. 30; Sheridan v. Fleming, 93 Mo. 321, 5 S. W. 813; State v. Holt County Court, 135 Mo. 533, 37 S. W. 521; Wayne County Savings Bank v. Supervisor of Township of Roscommon, 97 Mich. 630, 56 N. W. 944; Huey v. Police Jury, 33 La. Ann. 1091. See Bates County v. Wills, supra; Francis v. A. T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 19 Kans. 303.) In the case of State v. Common Council it was said:

"'Nor is it of any importance, in a legal point of view, that many of the citizens have contributed their full proportions of the money which should have been applied in payment of these debts whilst others have refused, it matters not whether rightfully or wrongfully. It seems oppressive, and is in some respects, no doubt, a great hardship, that those who are diligent and prompt in the discharge of their obligations to the public should be compelled to suffer on account of the delinquencies of others, occasioned sometimes by the mistakes of the officers of the law, or, it may be, of the legislature, but more frequently the fault of the delinquents themselves. It is an evil inseparable from every system of taxation, a subject always difficult and never free from vices and imperfections—a misfortune which must ever attend those who dwell in communities where any are unwilling to bear their just share of the public burdens. In such affairs the taxpayers are, as it were, sureties for one another. What one gains by accident or fraud the other must lose. No deductions are ever made from the public revenues for such causes. The deficiencies of one year must be made up the next and diverted funds restored. If these inequalities, often inevitable, were to constitute an excuse for the nonpayment of taxes, public faith would be at an end and government must cease. Who doubts, for instance, that under our present law, rigid and impartial as the legislature have endeavored to make it, great injustice is frequently done; that some are charged beyond their due proportion, whilst very many fall far short of it? So long as men suppress truth and make false and corrupt statements of the amount and value of their property, and so long as mistakes occur so long these things will continue. But the remedy does not consist in a refusal to pay all taxes. The evils, so far as possible, are to be obviated by the rigid enforcement of the law, the punishment of those who transgress its provisions, and the election of faithful and competent officers. Clearly such grievances, however perplexing and burdensome, are nothing to the public creditor, who has the right to look to the whole people for the payment of his demand. The duty of the common council is continuing, and does not cease with the levying of one tax which is in part unsuccessful. It ends only when the whole money is collected and the debt actually paid. They can not, therefore, say that their powers are exhausted and no new tax can be levied.'"

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to employ the short time given me to make a suggestion or two about the development of agriculture and animal industry in my own State of Vermont. I know that it is natural for some people who do not live in that State often to think of it as they see it on the map, a little place sprinkled all over with mountains. We do not have the vast areas for cultivation or grazing that are part of the wealth of the larger States of the West, but we do make good use of the land that we have and it is good soil and fertile and amply repays the labor put upon it. Yet there is little popular information to the effect that we have considerable agricultural resources or that they are highly specialized and intensely developed.

If I were to cite to you by way of one hint, for instance, that Vermont's average yield of corn per acre was larger than that of any other State in the Union and was nearly twice that of the average for the United States, gentlemen would get some idea about what intensive agriculture means in a little State like ours where people are really devoting their minds and energies to it. I have other figures and statistics that will tend to show something of what the people of my State through their energy and enterprise have done on the sides of the old Green Mountains and in the pleasant valleys that lie among them, and desire to place the statement in the RECORD as I have indicated. [Applause.]

The statement referred to is as follows:

Statistics compiled by the State publicity department, of which Walter H. Crockett is director, show that in 1921 Vermont's average yield of corn per acre was larger than that of any other State and was nearly twice that of the average for the United States; that only four States exceeded Vermont in value of oats per acre; that three States exceeded Vermont in value of spring wheat per acre; that six States exceeded Vermont in per acre yield of barley; that three States were better than Vermont in buckwheat per acre; that Vermont's potato yield was exceeded by four States in per acre value; that Vermont was eleventh State in hay yield per acre.

The average yield per acre in Vermont and the United States follows: Corn: Vermont, 55 bushels; United States, 29.7. Oats: Vermont, 33; United States, 33.7. Barley: Vermont, 25; United States, 20.9. Spring wheat: Vermont, 14; United States, 10.5. Buckwheat: Vermont, 22; United States, 21. Potatoes: Vermont, 150; United States, 90.9. Hay: Vermont, 1.05 tons; United States, 1.39.

Following are the total yields in Vermont for the years 1921 and 1920:

Corn: 1921, 4,150,000 bushels; 1920, 3,807,000 bushels.
Oats: 1921, 2,673,000 bushels; 1920, 2,835,000 bushels.
Spring wheat: 1921, 126,000 bushels; 1920, 209,000 bushels.
Barley: 1921, 200,000 bushels; 1920, 308,000 bushels.
Buckwheat: 1921, 88,000 bushels; 1920, 84,000 bushels.
Potatoes: 1921, 3,750,000 bushels; 1920, 3,510,000 bushels.
Hay: 1921, 945,000 tons; 1920, 1,234,000 tons.
Apples: 1921, 600,000 bushels; 1920, 933,000 bushels.
Pears: 1921, 6,000 bushels; 1920, 10,000 bushels.
The farm values of Vermont crops for 1921 and 1920 follow:

	1921	1920
Corn	$3,428,000	$4,797,000
Oats	1,577,000	2,126,000
Spring wheat	158,000	418,000
Barley	160,000	370,000
Buckwheat	79,000	113,000
Potatoes	3,900,000	4,388,000
Hay	20,790,000	28,382,000
Apples	1,110,000	1,489,000
Pears	19,000	28,000
Total	31,281,000	42,411,000

This list does not include rye, field beans, tobacco, or garden truck. Rye is omitted for the first time. Its acreage in the State has been small for several years.

The average value per acre for the United States for the staple crops combined is $14.52. Three of these crops—cotton, rye, and tobacco—are not included in the Vermont report, but the average value per acre for the seven staple crops grown in this State is $42.52, or nearly three times the national average. The United States average for the 10 staple crops for a period of 56 years is $14.04.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the status of the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has 54 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas has 68 minutes remaining.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 10769) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to-day, be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be printed in the RECORD in eight-point type. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that the bonus bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, sometimes referred to as the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] give us any idea as to when the adjusted compensation bill will be called up for consideration?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I can only say that it is contemplated that the committee will be called together on Saturday next for the purpose of reporting the bill, so that, of course, nothing will be done on the bill before next week under any circumstances. I can not answer further than that.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10769) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I.—DEFINITIONS.

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "World War adjusted compensation act."

SEC. 2. As used in this act—

(a) The term "veteran" includes any individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918; but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage;

(b) The term "oversea service" means service on shore in Europe or Asia, exclusive of China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; and service afloat, not on receiving ships; including in either case the period from the date of embarkation for such service to the date of disembarkation on return from such service, both dates inclusive;

(c) The term "home service" means all service not oversea service;

(d) The term "adjusted service credit" means the amount of the credit computed under the provisions of Title II; and

(e) The term "person" includes a partnership, corporation, or association, as well as an individual.

TITLE II.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CREDIT.

SEC. 201. The amount of adjusted service credit shall be computed by allowing the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of oversea service, and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no oversea service shall not exceed $500, and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed any oversea service shall not exceed $625.

SEC. 202. In computing the adjusted service credit no allowance shall be made to—

(a) Any commissioned officer above the grade of captain in the Army or Marine Corps, lieutenant in the Navy, first lieutenant or first lieutenant of engineers in the Coast Guard, or passed assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service, or having the pay and allowances, if not the rank, of any officer superior in rank to any of such grades—in each case for the period of service as such;

(b) Any individual holding a permanent or provisional commission or permanent or acting warrant in any branch of the military or naval forces, or (while holding such commission or warrant) serving under a temporary commission in a higher grade—in each case for the period of service under such commission or warrant or in such higher grade after the accrual of the right to pay thereunder. This subdivision shall not apply to any noncommissioned officer;

(c) Any civilian officer or employee of any branch of the military or naval forces, contract surgeon, cadet of the United States Military Academy, midshipman, cadet of the Coast Guard, member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, member of the Students' Army Training Corps (except an enlisted man detailed thereto), Philippine Scout, member of the Philippine Guard, member of the Philippine Constabulary, member of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, member of the National Guard of Hawaii, member of the insular force of the Navy, member of the Samoan native guard and band of the Navy, or Indian Scout—in each case for the period of service as such;

(d) Any individual entering the military or naval forces after November 11, 1918—for any period after such entrance;

(e) Any commissioned or warrant officer performing home service not with troops and receiving commutation of quarters or of subsistence—for the period of such service;

(f) Any member of the Public Health Service—for any period during which he was not detailed for duty with the Army or the Navy;

(g) Any individual granted a farm or industrial furlough—for the period of such furlough; or

(h) Any individual detailed for work on roads or other highway construction or repair work—for the period during which his pay was equalized to conform to the compensation paid to civilian employees in the same or like employment, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919.

SEC. 203. (a) The periods referred to in subdivision (e) of section 202 may be included in the case of any individual if and to the extent that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly find that such service subjected such individual to exceptional hazard. A full statement of all action under this subdivision shall be included in the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy required by section 307.

(b) In computing the credit to any veteran under this title effect shall be given to all subdivisions of section 202 which are applicable.

(c) If part of the service is oversea service and part is home service, the home service shall first be used in computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 201.

(d) For the purpose of computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 201, any period of service after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, in the military or naval forces in any capacity may be included, notwithstanding allowance of credit for such period, or a part thereof, is prohibited under the provisions of section 202, except that the periods referred to in subdivisions (b), (c), and (d) of that section shall not be included.

(e) For the purposes of section 201, in the case of members of the National Guard or of the National Guard Reserve called into service by the proclamation of the President dated July 3, 1917, the time of service between the date of call into the service as specified in such proclamation and August 5, 1917, both dates inclusive, shall be deemed to be active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

TITLE III.—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

OPTIONAL PLANS.

SEC. 301. Each veteran shall have the right to avail himself of any one, but only one, of the following plans:

(1) To receive "adjusted service pay," as provided in Title IV; but the veteran can not choose this plan if the amount of his adjusted service credit is more than $50;

(2) To receive an "adjusted service certificate," as provided in Title V;

(b) Such application shall be made on or before July 1, 1923, and if not made on or before such date shall be held void; but if application for land settlement aid is made on or before such date, the time for receiving the credits and exercising the preferences provided for in Title VIII shall be as specified in such title.

(c) An application shall be made (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made by a representative other than one authorized by any such regulation shall be held void.

(d) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly make any regulations necessary to the efficient administration of the provisions of this section.

PROOF OF VETERAN'S CHOICE OF PLAN.

SEC. 303. (1) That the applicant is a veteran;

(2) His name and address;

(3) The plan chosen; and

(4) The amount of his adjusted service credit.

(b) Upon receipt of such certificate the officer or board to which it is transmitted shall proceed to extend to the veteran the benefits conferred by the plan chosen, as provided for in this act.

PUBLICITY.

SEC. 304. (a) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, jointly prepare and publish a pamphlet or pamphlets containing a digest and explanation of the provisions of this act, accompanied by such statements as to the comparative advantages of each of the plans enumerated in section 301 as may be of assistance to veterans in making their choice among such plans; and shall from time to time thereafter jointly prepare and publish such additional or supplementary information as may be found necessary.

(b) The officer or board having charge of the administration of any plan or part thereof enumerated in section 301 shall transmit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as soon as practicable after the passage of this act full information and explanations as to the matters of which such officer or board has charge, which shall be considered by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in preparing the publications referred to in subdivision (a).

(c) The publications provided for in subdivision (a) shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may determine to be most effective to inform veterans of their rights under this act.

STATISTICS.

SEC. 305. Immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain the individuals who are veterans as defined in section 2 and, as to each veteran, the number of days of oversea service and of home service, as defined in section 2, for which he is entitled to receive adjusted service credit; and their decisions shall not be subject to review by the general accounting office.

ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS.

SEC. 306. Any officer or board charged with any function under this act shall make such regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as may be necessary to the efficient administration of such function.

SEC. 307. Any officer or board charged with the administration of any plan under this act, or of any part thereof, shall make a full report to Congress on the first Monday of December of each year.

EXEMPTION FROM ATTACHMENT AND TAXATION.

SEC. 308. No sum payable under this act to a veteran, or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under Title V, no adjusted service certificate, and no proceeds of any loan made on such certificate, shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process, or to national or State taxation.

UNLAWFUL FEES.

SEC. 309. Any person who charges or collects, or attempts to charge or collect, either directly or indirectly, any fee or other compensation for assisting in any manner a veteran in obtaining any of the benefits, privileges, or loans to which he is entitled under the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

TITLE IV.—ADJUSTED SERVICE PAY.

SEC. 401. There shall be paid to any veteran, as soon as practicable after receipt of an application in accordance with the provisions of section 302, and in addition to any other amounts due him in pursuance of law, the amount of his adjusted service credit, if, and only if, such credit is not more than $50.

SEC. 402. Payment shall be made by the Secretary of War if the veteran is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; and by the Secretary of the Navy if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

SEC. 403. If the veteran dies after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302 for adjusted service pay and before receiving payment, payment shall be made to his estate.

SEC. 404. No right to adjusted service pay under the provisions of this title shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not pay the amount of adjusted service pay to any person other than the veteran or his estate or such representative of the veteran as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

The certificate shall be dated, and all rights conferred under the provisions of this title shall take effect as of, October 1, 1922. The veteran shall name the beneficiary of the certificate and may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, alter such beneficiary. The amount of the face value of the certificate (unless the certificate has been canceled as hereinafter in this title provided) shall be payable (1) to the veteran on September 30, 1942, or (2) upon the death of the veteran prior thereto, to the beneficiary named; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, the amount of the face value of the certificate shall be paid to the estate of the veteran.

LOAN PRIVILEGES BEFORE OCTOBER 1, 1925.

SEC. 502. (a) A loan may be made to any veteran prior to September 30, 1925, upon his adjusted-service certificate only in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(b) Any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia (hereinafter in this section called "bank"), is authorized to loan to any veteran upon his promissory note secured by his adjusted-service certificate (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof) any amount not in excess of 50 per cent of the loan basis (as defined in subdivision (f) of this section) of the certificate, such loan to mature on or before September 30, 1925. The rate of interest charged upon the loan by the bank shall not exceed by more than 2 per cent per annum the rate charged at the date of the loan for the discount of commercial paper under section 13 of the Federal reserve act by the Federal reserve bank for the Federal reserve district in which the bank is located.

(c) If the veteran does not pay the principal and interest of the loan within six months after its maturity (or on or before Sept. 30, 1925, if the loan matures on or after Mar. 30, 1925), the bank shall present the certificate and the note to the Secretary of the Treasury not earlier than May 30, 1925, and not later than October 15, 1925. The Secretary shall thereupon cancel the note and the certificate and pay to the bank the amount of the unpaid principal due it, and the unpaid interest accrued, at the rate fixed in the note up to the date of the check issued to the bank. The difference between 80 per cent of the loan basis of the certificate at the time of its receipt by the Secretary and the amount so paid to the bank shall be immediately paid by the Secretary to the veteran, if living. If the veteran dies before such difference can be paid to him, it shall be paid to the beneficiary under the certificate; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, then the payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran.

(d) If the veteran dies before the maturity of the loan, the amount of the unpaid principal and the unpaid interest accrued up to the date of his death shall be immediately due and payable. In such case, or if the veteran dies after the maturity of the loan (but either before the expiration of six months after the maturity of the loan or before Oct. 1, 1925), the bank shall, upon notice of the death, present the certificate and note to the Secretary, who shall thereupon cancel the note (but not the certificate) and pay to the bank, in full satisfaction of its claim, the amount of the unpaid principal and unpaid interest, at the rate fixed in the note, accrued up to the date of the check issued to the bank; except that if, prior to the payment, the bank is notified of the death by the Secretary of the Treasury and fails to present the certificate and note to the Secretary within 15 days after the notice, such interest shall be only up to the fifteenth day after such notice. The Secretary shall deduct the amount so paid from the face value (as determined under section 501) of the certificate and pay the remainder in accordance with the provisions of section 501.

(e) When any loan becomes in default, the bank shall within 30 days thereafter notify the Secretary of the Treasury of the facts relative to the note, the name of the veteran, and the number of his certificate.

(f) The loan basis of any certificate at any time shall, for the purposes of this section, be the amount of the adjusted service credit, plus interest thereon from October 1, 1922, to such time at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually.

(g) No payment upon any note shall be made under this section by the Secretary of the Treasury to any bank unless the note when presented to him is accompanied by an affidavit made by an officer of the bank before a notary public or other officer designated for the purpose by regulation of the Secretary, and stating that the bank has not charged or collected, or attempted to charge or collect, directly or indirectly, any fee or other compensation (except interest as authorized by this section) in respect to or because of any loan made under this section by the bank to a veteran. Any bank which, or director, officer, or employee thereof who, does so charge, collect, or attempt to charge or collect any such fee or compensation shall be liable to the veteran for a penalty of $100, to be recovered in a civil suit brought by the veteran.

LOAN PRIVILEGES AFTER SEPTEMBER 30, 1925.

SEC. 503. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to instruct postmasters of the first, second, and third classes to take applications of veterans for Government loans and collect payments thereon.

SEC. 504. (a) Application for Government loans may be made at any post office of a first, second, or third class. Such loans, secured by the adjusted-service certificate, shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, with or without the consent of the beneficiary, and payments thereon collected, in accordance with the provisions of this title, under rules and regulations prescribed by him. He shall supply postmasters of the first, second, and third classes with blanks upon which veterans may make applications for Government loans. Such applications shall be in the form prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and have attached thereto a form of promissory note to be executed by the veteran, and a receipt, to be delivered to the veteran, which shall be signed by the postmaster receiving the application, and which shall acknowledge the receipt of the note and the certificate, and contain a description of each. The postmaster shall thereupon transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury the application, note, and certificate. Upon the approval of the loan by the Secretary of the Treasury, he shall transmit to the veteran a check for the amount of the loan. He shall also issue in triplicate a statement showing the name and service of the veteran, the number of his certificate, and a schedule of the amounts of the several payments and the dates when due. The original of the statement shall be retained with the application, the duplicate shall be transmitted to the postmaster receiving the application and the triplicate to the veteran. The postmaster holding such statement shall receive and indorse thereon the payments made by the veteran; shall give a receipt to the veteran; and shall promptly transmit payments to the Secretary of the Treasury. Such payments shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The veterans shall make repayment of the loan upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (1) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum and (2) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period not exceeding the life of the certificate.

(b) If the veteran fails to make any payment when due, and such default continues for the period of one year, thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall declare the certificate of the veteran to be forfeited and cancel and surrender the note to the veteran; but if the Secretary of the Treasury subsequently finds any such certificate was forfeited by mistake, or under any misapprehension of fact, he shall reinstate the same upon payment of the amount then due the Government on the loan, and upon the receipt of a new note from the veteran on the same terms as the original note for the remaining amount due.

(c) If the veteran is in default and his certificate is forfeited, when he has borrowed an amount less than the maximum authorized under either subdivision (a) or (b) of section 505, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to him 80 per cent of the difference between what he has borrowed and the maximum which he was authorized to borrow under either subdivision (a) or (b) of section 505. If the veteran dies before such 80 per cent can be paid to him, it shall be paid to the beneficiary under the certificate; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, then the payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran.

SEC. 505. No Government loan shall be made upon any certificate prior to October 1, 1925. The amount of such loans to any one veteran outstanding at any time shall not exceed:

(a) If the loan is made on or after October 1, 1925, and before October 1, 1928, 85 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service credit of the veteran plus (2) interest thereon from October 1, 1922, to the date of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually, or

(b) If the loan is made on or after October 1, 1928, and before October 1, 1942, 70 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service credit of the veteran increased by 25 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon from October 1, 1922, to the date of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually.

SEC. 506. No certificate issued or right conferred under the provisions of this title shall, except for the purpose of securing a loan under the provisions of section 502 or 504, be negotiable or assignable or serve as security for a loan. Any negotiation, assignment, or loan made in violation of any provision of this section shall be held void.

SEC. 507. In the case of the death of the veteran or the forfeiture of his certificate, any Government loan made upon the certificate, and the note in respect thereto, shall be canceled; and in case such loan has been canceled as a result of the death of the veteran, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct the amount of the unpaid principal and interest of the loan from the amount of the face value of the certificate in respect to which the loan is made.

SEC. 508. Any certificate issued under the provisions of this title shall have printed upon its face the conditions and terms upon which it is issued and to which it is subject, including loan values under sections 502 and 505.

SEC. 509. If the veteran dies after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302 and before October 1, 1922, the amount of the adjusted service credit of the veteran shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to his estate.

TITLE VI.—VOCATIONAL TRAINING AID.

SEC. 601. The Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "director") upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 303, is hereby directed to pay to the veteran designated therein (if he is not receiving the benefits of the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended) the sum of $1.75 for each day of his attendance (on or after January 1, 1923), on a course of vocational training previously approved by the director as suitable for such veteran. Such payments shall be made without deduction for Sundays, holidays, or vacations not exceeding two weeks in duration, or for absence for other cause which the director deems justifiable; but the total payment shall not exceed 140 per cent of the amount of the adjusted service credit of the veteran.

Payments under this section shall be made monthly, or at more frequent intervals, as the director may determine generally or in special cases.

SEC. 602. The director shall establish such regulations as will insure the regular attendance of the veteran on his course of training, and no sum or sums shall be payable under this title unless the director has been furnished proof of such regular attendance. For each day of unjustifiable absence the veteran shall forfeit the sum payable for that day, and shall receive no reimbursement for it in any other form.

SEC. 603. If the payment under section 601 plus the amounts forfeited under section 602 is less than 140 per cent of the adjusted service credit, either by reason of the duration of the course approved, or by reason of the veteran's discontinuing, with the approval of the director, his attendance on his course of training, he shall be entitled to receive an amount equal to the difference between (1) his adjusted service credit and (2) that proportion thereof which the payments made or accrued under section 601 plus the amounts forfeited under section 602 bear to 140 per cent of his adjusted service credit: Provided, That from the amount thus computed there shall be deducted an amount equal to the sums forfeited under section 602.

SEC. 604. If before the completion of the payments under this title the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further payments shall be made under this title.

SEC. 605. (a) If the veteran dies after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302 and before any payments have been made or have accrued under this title, the amount of the adjusted service credit of the veteran shall be paid by the director to his estate.

(b) If the veteran dies after the course of training has begun, his estate shall be paid by the director the same amount as would have been paid to the veteran under section 603, treating for such purposes the date of his death as the date of discontinuance of attendance on his course of training.

SEC. 606. (a) The director is hereby authorized to cooperate with State boards for vocational education in such manner as will secure their assistance in the approval of courses of training for veterans and other assistance in carrying out the provisions of this title.

(b) Whenever any State provides funds for assistance to veterans in attendance upon approved courses or provides for free tuition in approved educational institutions, the director is authorized and directed to cooperate with the State board for vocational education of such State in securing the maximum educational opportunities to veterans entitled to the benefits of this title.

TITLE VII.—FARM OR HOME AID.

SEC. 701. (a) The National Veterans' Settlement Board created by Title VIII (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "board") upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 303, is hereby directed, on or after January 1, 1923, to pay to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service credit increased by 40 per cent.

(b) Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make improvements on a city or suburban home, or a farm not selected under Title VIII, or to purchase or make payments on such a home or farm.

SEC. 702. No such payment shall be made unless and until the board has approved the purpose for which it is desired by the veteran, and has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose. The board may, at the option of the veteran, or on its own motion, make the payment directly to the vendor or other person to whom such payment is due from the veteran.

SEC. 703. For the purpose of enabling it to pass upon the desirability of the investment the board may make use of the services of land bank appraisers of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be designated by the latter board.

SEC. 704. (a) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302 for farm or home aid and before a contract has been entered into with the approval of the board, the amount of his adjusted service credit shall be paid by the board to his estate, but no such payment shall be made if the veteran has been separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions or discharged therefrom on account of his alienage.

(b) If before the veteran's death a contract has been entered into with the approval of the board, and payments under this title on such contract are still due, such payments shall be made by the board to the vendor or other person to whom such payments are due from the veteran.

TITLE VII.—LAND SETTLEMENT.

NATIONAL VETERANS' SETTLEMENT BOARD.

SEC. 801. (a) There is hereby established a board to be known as the "National Veterans' Settlement Board" (hereinafter in this title called the "board") and to be composed of five members as follows:

(1) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter in this title called the "Secretary") and

(2) Four members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(b) No veteran retired for age or longevity of service from active service in the military or naval forces shall be eligible for appointment to, or remain eligible for membership upon, the board. Any vacancy in the office of an appointed member shall be filled in the same manner and under the same limitations as in the case of the original appointment.

(c) The Secretary shall be the executive and administrative officer to carry out the plans and purposes adopted by the board under the provisions of Title VII and of this title. The members of the board, except the Secretary, shall receive an annual salary of $7,500. Of the members appointed to the board in the first instance, one shall be appointed for a term of two years, one for three years, one for four years, and one for five years. Their successors shall hold office for terms of five years; except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he succeeds.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROJECTS.

SEC. 802. The board is hereby authorized to establish veteran settlement projects (hereinafter in this title called "projects") for the reclamation and settlement of lands by means of irrigation, drainage, or other manner or method of development and improvement thereof, including the building of necessary public roads within the projects. Projects shall be selected by the board with a view to the development of one or more projects in each of the several States where the establishment of a project is feasible.

SEC. 803. (a) The board may by gift, purchase, deed in trust, or otherwise acquire lands suitable for any project; but no project shall be finally selected, and no lands shall be acquired by purchase, unless the price and other conditions of acquisition have been submitted to and approved by (1) the governor of the State in which the lands are located, (2) as to price only, a land bank appraiser to be designated by the Federal Farm Loan Board, and (3) the board. If the governor of the State fails to signify his approval or disapproval within such time as the board by regulation shall determine, the land commissioner, or if there is in the State no official of such title, then the agency which under the laws of the State is authorized to perform the functions ordinarily exercised by a land commissioner, may act in lieu of the governor.

(b) In case any project includes privately owned land, no construction work shall be commenced upon the project until the owners of all such land in the project have each conveyed or agreed to convey to the United States title to all land owned by him in excess of a farm unit as established for the project under the provisions of section 806.

(c) The Secretary (1) may withdraw from location, sale, settlement, entry, or other disposition and place under the control of the board such unappropriated public lands as he deems necessary for any project, and (2) shall restore to public entry lands so withdrawn, if subsequently the board finds that such lands are not so required.

(d) The board may in its discretion contract with any irrigation or drainage district or other public corporation organized under the laws of the State in which the project is located to establish, develop, improve, and otherwise cooperate (in accordance with the provisions of this title) in the execution of, and the administration of the affairs of, any project comprising only the lands of such district or corporation.

COOPERATION WITH FEDERAL AND STATE AGENCIES.

SEC. 804. The board may, in executing the provisions of this title—

(a) Make use of, cooperate with, and allot moneys appropriated for its use to, any existing agency of the Federal Government which agrees to act as the agent of the board. Such agency is hereby authorized, within the limits of the moneys allotted it and under the direction of the board, to perform work in connection with any project.

(b) Whenever a State provides funds to be expended by the board in the establishment, development, and improvement of any project within the State, the board may contract with the State, or any agency thereof designated by the governor, to cooperate with the board, to such extent as the board deems advisable, in the work in connection with the project. The board may further establish a branch office in the State to administer matters arising in connection with projects in the State.

(c) Whenever a State provides not less than 25 per cent of the amount of the funds which are, in the opinion of the board, necessary to be expended by it in the establishment, development, and improvement of any project within the State, the board shall authorize the State, or any agency thereof designated by the governor, to undertake, subject to the general supervision of the board, (1) the selection, acquisition, and subdivision of lands for, and the improvement of farms within, any project, and (2) the development thereof after the project is open to settlement.

SEC. 805. So far as practicable, veterans shall be employed and their services utilized in the administrative and field work necessary to the establishment and development of any project by the board and all Federal agencies cooperating therewith. All contracts or other agreements of the board with any cooperating State or agency thereof shall contain a like stipulation. At the earliest practicable date each veteran so employed upon a project shall be allowed to select and shall be allotted, as hereinafter in this title provided, a farm unit upon which he may construct a dwelling and make other improvements.

ALLOTMENT AND SALE OF LANDS.

SEC. 806. (a) The board shall establish for each project or portion thereof (1) farm units of an acreage sufficient, in the opinion of the board, for cultivation by and the support of a family, and (2) farm worker's units of a small acreage sufficient, in the opinion of the board, for part-time cultivation by a farm worker's family.

(b) The board may set apart and reserve tracts within any project for use free from all charge for community and other public purposes, but the title to such lands shall remain in the United States. Whenever any such tract fails to be used for the purpose for which it was set apart and reserved, the board shall, after due notice and hearing, declare the tract forfeited to the United States. Such tract shall thereupon resume its original status.

(c) The board may establish town sites within any project and develop and sell lots therein to veterans and repatriates only, under such regulations and upon such terms as it shall prescribe.

SEC. 807. (a) When used in this title, the term "repatriate" includes (1) any citizen of the United States who has served with the military or naval forces of any nation allied against the German Government or its allies without loss of citizenship, and (2) any former citizen of the United States who has so served with loss of such citizenship but has since been repatriated; except that such term shall not include a veteran or any individual who was separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions.

(b) Whenever in the opinion of the board farm units or farm workers' units, within any project, are available for settlement, the board shall give public notice and description thereof, together with a statement of the construction charges and other conditions incident thereto, and shall mail individual notices to any veteran whose name has been certified to the board under the provisions of section 303. The board shall allot a farm unit or a farm worker's unit to any such veteran or repatriate who applies therefor in such manner as the board shall by regulation prescribe. As between applicants, preference in making allotments shall be given, first, to a veteran who has been employed upon and who has rendered substantial service in the development of any project; and, second, to a veteran or repatriate who, in the opinion of the board, is least likely to fail in his enterprise or to cause the United States loss.

(c) The board shall allot farm units, farm workers' units, and town lots to veterans and repatriates only.

SEC. 808. (a) The cost of construction, including the purchase price of any lands acquired for the project, but excluding administrative expenses and the expenses of maintaining general offices and exercising general supervision over projects, shall be apportioned equitably among the farm units, farm workers' units, town lots, and other tracts within the project in proportion to the selling value of each unit, lot, or tract; and the total sale price of all lands within the project shall be fixed with a view of repaying the total of such construction cost of the project.

(b) Each allottee of a farm unit or farm worker's unit shall pay to the board such price as the board shall fix for the unit in pursuance of the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section; except that in case the allottee is a veteran there shall be deducted from such price the amount of his adjusted service credit.

(c) A veteran or repatriate may, at his option, in lieu of payment in full at the time of entry, pay all balances due upon the purchase price for his unit upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (1) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 5 per cent per annum and (2) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period, not exceeding 25 years from the making of the contract of purchase. In the case of a veteran, the installments shall be so arranged that he will not be required to pay any installment until two years after the making of the contract of purchase. The board may in its discretion, whenever it is of the opinion that any emergency has caused default in the payment of any installment of the veteran or repatriate, postpone the payment of such installment until such date as it deems expedient. Such postponed payments shall continue to bear interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of the contract of purchase. The board shall make such regulations as to residence upon, and use or cultivation of, units by a veteran or repatriate as in the opinion of the board will carry out the purpose of making the unit his permanent home.

SEC. 809. A patent or deed, as the case demands, shall immediately be issued to a purchaser who has paid the full price for his unit, and may be issued at any time more than five years after the date of purchase to any purchaser under the amortization plan who has met all payments then due from him to the board and has observed all conditions prescribed by regulations issued under the provisions of subdivision (c) of section 808. Each such patent or deed shall expressly reserve to the United States a prior lien on the land patented or deeded, superior to all other liens, claims, or demands whatsoever, for the repayment of all sums due or to become due to the board.

SEC. 810. (a) If the veteran dies after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 302 for land settlement aid and before having entered into a contract of purchase under section 808, the amount of his adjusted service credit shall be paid by the board to his estate, but no such payment shall be made if the veteran has been separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions or discharged therefrom on account of his alienage.

(b) If the veteran or repatriate dies previous to the completion of his contract of purchase the successor by law to his interest in the land, if a widow or heir at law, may assume the contract of purchase. If the successor is other than a widow or heir at law the balance due the board under the contract of purchase shall be due immediately and shall be paid the board within such time after the death of the veteran as the board shall by regulation prescribe.

SEC. 811. No lands within any project shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issue of the deed or patent therefor. No transfer, assignment, mortgage, or lease of the interest of any purchaser of a unit shall, unless approved by the board, be valid previous to the issue of the deed or patent for the land, or within five years after the date of purchase.

SEC. 812. Prior to the issue of a deed or patent, as the case may be, for any unit, lot, or tract within a project, such unit, lot, or tract shall be subject to taxation by any State, or political subdivision thereof, but only upon the appraised value of the owner's interest in the land and improvements thereon. If the owner fails to pay any such tax or assessment, the board is authorized to pay such tax or assessment and to include the amount of the payment, together with interest and penalties at the rate provided by law for delinquent taxes in the State in which the land is located, in the installments payable under the contract of purchase.

SEC. 813. Upon the default of any payment due to the board under, or upon the violation of, the provisions of subdivision (c) of section 808, or of section 810, 811, or 812, the interest of the purchaser in the unit shall revert to the United States free of all encumbrances, but subject to the right of the defaulting debtor, or any mortgagee, lien holder, judgment creditor, or subsequent purchaser, to redeem the land, within one year after the board gives notice of such default, by payment of all moneys due with interest at 8 per cent per annum from the date of default, and costs. The board, at its option, may cause the land to be sold at any time after such failure to redeem. From the proceeds of the sale the board shall retain all moneys due, with interest as provided, and costs. The balance of the proceeds, if any, shall be the property of the defaulting debtor or his assignee. In the case of sale after failure to redeem under this section, the board is authorized to bid in such land at not more than the amount in default, including interest and costs.

SEC. 814. In case a veteran has entered upon land reclaimed under the reclamation law, the board shall, upon application of the veteran, pay to the reclamation fund the amount of the adjusted service credit of the veteran, and the Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon credit such sum to the amount payable to the fund by the veteran.

RECEIPTS FROM PROJECTS.

SEC. 815. All moneys received by the board as payments in respect to lands within any project shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; except that from such receipts shall be deducted the amounts required to make such repayment or reimbursement to any State or designated agency thereof, or to any district or other public corporation, as is necessary to carry into effect the provisions of subdivision (d) of section 803 and of subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 804.

APPLICABILITY OF RECLAMATION LAW.

SEC. 816. The board shall, so far as possible, in executing the provisions of this title, make use of existing agencies in the Department of the Interior and comply with the reclamation law in so far as such law is applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title. Such reclamation law shall, for the purposes of this title, be deemed applicable to the reclamation of lands by drainage or by any other manner or method, as well as to reclamation by irrigation. This section shall not be construed to give the board any control over the disposition of moneys in the reclamation fund.

EFFECTIVE DATE.

SEC. 817. Sections 802 to 816, both inclusive, shall take effect on January 1, 1923.

TITLE IX.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

With the exception of such special experts as may be found necessary for the conduct of the work, all such appointments shall be made subject to the civil service laws; but for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of section 305 such appointments may be made without regard to such laws until the services of persons duly qualified under such laws are available. SEC. 904. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and the National Veterans' Settlement Board shall severally submit to Congress in the manner provided by law estimates of the amounts necessary to be expended in carrying out such provisions of this act as each is charged with administering, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, amounts sufficient to defray such expenditures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in speaking to-day in regard to the four-power treaty, I desire first to trace briefly the negotiations which resulted in the adoption of that treaty by the four signatory powers.

The chief and most important point in the treaty is the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That was the main object of the treaty. The subject had been under discussion for some time before the conference met. It had been under discussion in the conference which was held in London last June between representatives of the British self-governing dominions and the Government of Great Britain itself. There was in that conference, although it has never been fully published to the world, a well known and very marked difference of opinion, to which I shall presently allude more in detail. No settlement was reached of the differences which arose upon the Anglo-Japanese alliance. During the time when that conference was in being, and later, during the summer, there was correspondence, I believe, and there certainly were conversations between the Secretary of State and representatives of the British Government in regard to this alliance, and the view of the United States upon it was very frankly and fully stated to the representatives of Great Britain.

At the imperial conference Canada was very strongly opposed to the continuation of the alliance. The feeling in Canada did not differ materially from that which was held in this country by all people who had given the subject consideration. Canada was anxious to see the alliance terminated. The New Zealand and Australian attitude was somewhat different. Both those dominions are extremely hostile to Japanese and Asian immigration, and have very stringent laws on the subject; but they felt that they were much more exposed, owing to their geographical position, than was Canada, and it seemed to them that the Anglo-Japanese alliance contained a measure of protection to them against any Japanese encroachments. They were, therefore, unwilling to have the alliance terminated unless some other arrangement was made; but Australia and New Zealand, through their prime ministers, and South Africa as well, stated that they favored no alliance between Great Britain and Japan which was not in all respects satisfactory to the United States.

When the conference met, after the preliminaries, after the appointment of committees and the presentation of the American proposition for the reduction of armament, the question of the Anglo-Japanese alliance was taken up almost at once for negotiation, and was very promptly disposed of, as the date of the treaty, December 16, shows. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was very much distressed by the secrecy which, in his opinion, shrouded the negotiations which resulted in the four-power treaty. That the subject was under consideration, that the delegations of the four signatory powers were considering it, that there were meetings between them and the heads of the different delegations, were facts well known to the press, and about which no secrecy ever existed. The discussions were informal; no minutes were kept; no stenographers were present, for the simple reason that it was not thought necessary, I believe, by anyone; certainly it was suggested by nobody. The four delegations had many talks amongst themselves in regard to the subject, and with each other, but it was agreed, without objection on the part of anyone, that the delegations should be represented by their respective heads. So Mr. Hughes, Mr. Balfour, Baron Kato, or Baron Shidehara, and Mr. Viviani represented their respective delegations in the conferences, comparatively few in number, which were held. Everything that was proposed was submitted first to the delegations by their representatives and reported to the delegations subsequently. That is the whole story of the negotiation, and that is all that the secrecy amounted to. There was really nothing to conceal. The purpose of the meetings was the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and the agreement on the two very simple articles which preceded it.

I may say at this point that no negotiations of which I have any knowledge—and I am speaking now of the conference and its work generally—were ever conducted with so little secrecy as were those held by the conference which has recently adjourned. Stenographers were present at all the meetings of the committees, communiqués were published every day after the meetings of the committees of the conference, and all that happened and all that was said in those meetings is in print in the volume of minutes which is now before the Senate.

In the particular case of the four-power treaty only the four powers represented were engaged and the negotiation was carried on as it was simply because it seemed the quickest and most direct way. The whole purpose was so obvious that the story was told by the result without any need of having stenographers to listen to informal conversations, a method which, I may say, if enforced, would probably put an end to all negotiations, for informal conversations amongst the representatives of the powers must be carried on, if at all, without the presence of stenographers. The fact that there were tentative drafts, of which some point was made by the Senator from Nebraska, seems to me, I must confess, wholly unimportant. Of course, different drafts were made and amended and considered and discussed in the conferences of the delegations and afterwards in the meetings of the heads of the delegations, just exactly as a committee of the Senate or a subcommittee in framing a bill will discuss amongst themselves various drafts and various amendments to the bill or the drafts.

Now, Mr. President, let me state, first, to what this treaty applies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is the Senator about to leave the topic he has been discussing?

Mr. LODGE. I was; yes.

Mr. REED. If the Senator does not object, I should like to ask him a question or two about it. Has anything been made public except the proceedings of the general meetings which were held in public?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is speaking now of the conference generally?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Everything has been made public. Of course, the proceedings at all the sessions of the plenary conference have been made public and all the meetings of the committees of the conference and subcommittees are published in the minutes. Stenographic minutes were taken of all of them and were published.

I will say to the Senator that there were two committees—one the committee on naval armaments, consisting of representatives of five powers, and one on questions affecting the Far East, consisting of representatives of nine powers. Those were the two committees appointed by the conference. There were subcommittees appointed by those committees for the consideration of specific subjects, and all that was said and done by those committees of the conference and by the subcommittees was taken down stenographically and printed.

Mr. REED. And distributed?

Mr. LODGE. They are in the hands of every Senator here and in our document room.

Mr. REED. In this volume which I hold in my hand?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to take the Senator's time, but the Senator stated the meetings of all the subcommittees were known to the press.

Mr. LODGE. In regard to the four-power meetings, I used the expression that the fact of those meetings was known to the press.

Mr. REED. The fact that they were having meetings?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. Of course, as to the others, all that was said was given to the press the same day.

Mr. REED. The fact that meetings were to be held was given to the press, but what took place at the meetings was not recorded?

Mr. LODGE. No; it was not recorded; there were no stenographers present.

Mr. REED. And never was given to the press?

Mr. LODGE. There were no minutes.

Mr. REED. What took place was never given to the press in any form?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think anybody repeated the conversations and gave them to the press.

Mr. REED. Were the conclusions given to the press?

Mr. LODGE. They were, as soon as they were reached. There was only one very simple conclusion.

Mr. REED. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one matter, in order to clear up the question we are on. I will state the facts as I understand them to be: That the President stated under the four-power pact the United States would be under no obligation with reference to what we call the mainland of Japan. Subsequently, on the same day, a statement was given to the press that the President had been informed that there had been an understanding between our representatives and the British, the French, and the Japanese representatives that the terms of the treaty did embrace the mainland of Japan, and thereupon the President gave a statement, according to the press, that he had been in error. Had such an understanding as that referred to been arrived at?

Mr. LODGE. There was no understanding about it at all; that was the clear meaning of the words used.

Mr. REED. The newspapers went further than that.

Mr. LODGE. I am not saying what the newspapers did; I am not responsible for them; I am saying what the view of the delegates was.

Mr. REED. I am only stating what the newspapers stated in order that I may ask a question. The newspapers went further and stated that the construction which had been put upon the language of the treaty by those who had framed the language was that it did embrace the mainland of Japan.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly; in my opinion, there could be no question about it as originally phrased.

Mr. REED. Had such a construction been arrived at, discussed and talked over, by the representatives at the meetings which were not public?

Mr. LODGE. Under the language adopted that was the perfectly natural and inevitable interpretation. I quote from the second paragraph of the treaty:

> With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions of the Pacific Ocean—

"Insular possessions and insular dominions," in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of every delegate, could not help covering Japan. Her own islands were her insular dominion.

Mr. REED. But the general public construction and the construction which the President put upon the language was that it did not cover what we call, for want of a better term, the mainland of Japan; and I am inquiring now not as to the construction which the Senator gets from the words themselves but whether in the discussions between the representatives of these countries it was understood and talked over that the words would cover the mainland of Japan.

Mr. LODGE. No one that I know of who was concerned in making the agreement had any doubt that they did cover the mainland of Japan. The only discussion that occurred was that the representative of Japan objected, not to the construction, because there could be no other, but to the inclusion of Japan, and asked for time to consider it, did consider it, and then informed the other delegations that though he was reluctant to accept it he withdrew his objection.

Mr. REED. And, if I correctly understand the Senator, the representative of Japan did not want the mainland of Japan to be included within the protectorate of this treaty?

Mr. LODGE. He did not desire it at first, and then agreed to it.

Mr. REED. So that makes it perfectly plain, then, that there was a discussion between the delegates as to whether the language of the treaty——

Mr. LODGE. I have stated to the Senator the only discussion that occurred. There was no discussion as to what it meant. The only discussion was as to whether Japan was willing to have the mainland of Japan, Japan proper, included in the treaty at all.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator object to telling us why the representative of Japan objected to having the mainland of Japan—as we will call it for want of a better term—included in this protectorate?

Mr. LODGE. As I have said, that objection was withdrawn, and the treaty appeared as first drafted.

Mr. REED. I know it was withdrawn and afterwards was incorporated in the supplemental treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I can tell the story better if the Senator will allow me to tell it without interrupting me before I can get the words out of my mouth.

Mr. REED. Certainly; I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I had just started to tell the story.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall ask any questions he desires, but when I am trying to answer one question I can not get far if I am interrupted at the end of my first half sentence.

Mr. REED. I simply misunderstood the Senator's attitude and manner of speech. All that I want is for the Senator to tell us all about it, and he shall take all the time he will.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I am trying to do, and I shall get on more rapidly if I am allowed to proceed.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The Japanese representative made that objection and said he should like to consider it further. He then, the next day, informed the other delegations that he withdrew his objection. Subsequently it appeared that the Government of Japan and the people of Japan were also opposed to it, and the representative of Japan renewed his objection. That is, he renewed his request that the mainland, the home territory of Japan, should be specifically excluded, as was done by the supplementary treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question in that connection?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. When Japan objected to her mainland being included, why did the other powers insist upon its being included?

Mr. LODGE. They did not insist.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why was it included?

Mr. LODGE. Because that was the natural meaning of the words used.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was her original objection?

Mr. LODGE. The original objection of Japan?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to explain that. As I understand it, the objection of Japan was that the mainland, the homeland, of the other three powers was not included, and they felt that it might be a reflection on her if she alone were included. In stating the Japanese position I am, of course, stating only what I understood. I have no right to speak for them.

Mr. ROBINSON. When Japan made that objection, whatever the ground upon which it was based, why did not the other powers yield to the objection at once and permit the mainland of Japan to be excepted?

Mr. LODGE. I am afraid I did not make myself clear. This language was agreed to by all. The Japanese representative, who was the Japanese ambassador at that time, said that he should like time to think it over before he assented. He did not ask that it be stricken out; he said that he should like time to think it over and consider it before he assented. He did consider it over one night and assented the next morning and withdrew any objection. To tell the truth, I do not think any of the other powers cared one way or the other about it.

Mr. REED. If the language included the mainland of Japan in the first instance, and was so understood, why was the treaty prepared in that way? Why was that language in the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The purpose of the treaty was to include all the insular dominions and possessions of the four signatory powers, and, by using the words "insular dominions and insular possessions," carefully to exclude continents; and that was the phrase selected in order to reach that purpose. When we said "insular dominions and insular possessions," of course, the main island of Japan, for instance, is an insular dominion of Japan in the Pacific Ocean and would be included.

Mr. REED. I understand that it is included in the term; but that is not the only term in the English language that could have been employed.

Mr. LODGE. No; no doubt the Senator could have found a better one, but that was the one that seemed to the delegations to cover it. After a good deal of consideration, that was thought to be the best descriptive term.

Mr. REED. And when you adopted it, you found it necessary afterwards, in order to straighten out the matter, to make a second treaty?

Mr. LODGE. We found it necessary to comply with the wishes of Japan; that is to say, we thought it desirable. Nobody considered it of any importance whether the home islands of Japan were included or whether they were not.

Mr. REED. It afterwards became of sufficient importance, so that a second treaty was made?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, in compliance with the wishes of Japan; yes.

Mr. REED. And in that second treaty you specified what particular islands should be included. The clause to which I call the Senator's attention in the supplemental treaty is this:

> The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

Why were the particular islands that have been named specified as being within the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Because that was the most direct way of excluding the homeland of Japan.

Mr. REED. I know it would exclude the homeland of Japan, but why was the island of Sakhalin put in?

Mr. LODGE. The southern portion of the island of Karafuto, I believe they call it, belongs to Japan.

Mr. REED. Why is it that that particular island, which was not one of the mandated islands, was put within the terms of the four-power treaty and under its protection?

Mr. LODGE. It was put there for the simple reason that the islands of Japan, which they consider part of their homeland, as I am informed, when they speak of the homeland of Japan, are under the direct government of Japan and form a part of the Government. These other islands have separate governments. Of course they are controlled by Japan, but they have separate governments. They are not under the home government. They are not places where the writs run.

Mr. REED. There is no question about the southern half of Karafuto or Sakhalin being Japanese territory?

Mr. LODGE. None whatever; neither is there any about Formosa or the Pescadores.

Mr. REED. Was anything said about liability of controversy arising over this island of Karafuto or Sakhalin?

Mr. LODGE. No suggestion at all was made about it that I am aware of.

Mr. REED. Nothing was said about it?

Mr. LODGE. As a matter of fact, it lies just off of Vladivostok.

Mr. REED. It lies just north of the main islands of Japan. The Senator says it lies just off Vladivostok?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it is off the coast of Siberia.

Mr. REED. The Japanese are now on the mainland of Russia, are they not?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; they have an army in eastern Siberia.

Mr. REED. This island is a very useful and important base for the Japanese in their occupancy of the mainland?

Mr. LODGE. I should not think so.

Mr. REED. Why not?

Mr. LODGE. I should not think it was of any particular importance to them. They have the mainland; that is, they have their troops on the mainland.

Mr. REED. Exactly; they have their troops on the mainland. If there is an effort made to push those troops out, does not the Senator think that this island might be very important for Japan to hold?

Mr. LODGE. It might be of value, of course. Japan owns half of it, and holds the other half on account of an uprising and a massacre which occurred there. It would be of military value to anyone attacking Vladivostok, no doubt; but, as far as being a base of support is concerned, they are practically as near their own islands as they are to Sakhalin.

Mr. REED. Are there valuable oil deposits in this island?

Mr. LODGE. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. REED. Is it not almost inevitable that if Russia undertakes to expel the Japanese from Russia, the fight will be carried to this island?

Mr. LODGE. Really, I can not undertake to predict what future wars may do.

Mr. REED. But the Senator is here engaged in making a treaty——

Mr. LODGE. I am.

Mr. REED. A treaty which has to do with the future, and with future wars.

Mr. LODGE. I hope not with future wars.

Mr. REED. With the prevention of future wars.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I hope.

Mr. REED. Therefore, the strategic questions must have been considered, and I want to ask if the question of the strategic importance of this island was not considered?

Mr. LODGE. Not to my knowledge. I never heard of its strategic importance being considered at all. I think it has little or none. That is a mere matter of opinion, where my opinion is just as good as that of the Senator from Missouri and no better.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator. We get on an equality for a moment.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to do it even for a moment.

Mr. REED. The question, then, of the strategic importance of this island, and of its liability to be drawn into a war between Japan and Russia, was not even considered or thought of by the American delegation?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we thought it of importance.

Mr. REED. Yet we agree to sit down at the table with the other three powers in the event any of these islands are attacked, this particular island now being named, and consult with them with reference to the best means of repelling the attack.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I meant to give every opportunity to the Senator, but I should rather discuss that question in my own way when I come to it.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to say something about that later.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator was going on to speak of the terms of the treaty.

Mr. REED. I was.

Mr. LODGE. And they, of course, include that question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator closes on that point will he tell us, if he can, just why Japan desired to exclude the homeland from the operation of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. It is difficult to explain the motives of other nations, or of other people, but as I understood it, the homelands of all the other signatories not being included, Japan regarded it, and apparently deeply regarded it, as some reflection on her national dignity.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. It developed during the deliberations of the committee, and was later stated on the floor of the Senate, that there were probably other drafts of the four-power pact, tentative in character, perhaps, and we sought to get them. It was thought, I believe, at one time that if those drafts were in existence they were in the possession of the Secretary of State.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether they are in his possession, or whether they were kept at all.

Mr. POMERENE. I was simply going to ask the Senator whether he had received any further information on that subject since the Secretary of State had returned?

Mr. LODGE. None whatever. I have not talked with him on the subject, and I have received no further information.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FRANCE. The Senator from Massachusetts has indicated that he would prefer to proceed with the discussion in his own way.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to answer any questions.

Mr. FRANCE. I would be very much pleased if, in the course of his remarks, the Senator would give us some information—information which for the moment I do not possess—as to how the southern portion of Sakhalin came to be under the dominion of Japan.

Mr. LODGE. I am surprised that the Senator, who is so familiar with all Russian questions, should not know that that was ceded to Japan under the treaty of Portsmouth.

Mr. FRANCE. I would also like to ask the Senator if it is not true that, so far as the northern portion of Sakhalin is concerned, that is a matter already in controversy between Japan and Russia, and that controversy arose out of the valuable mineral deposits in the northern part of Sakhalin, particularly oil?

Mr. LODGE. That information was not presented to the conference in any way. There was a massacre at Nicolaievsk, on the island, in which a considerable number of Japanese citizens, including the Japanese consul, were killed. I have seen the number put as high as 700; but it was a large number. Japan thereupon took military possession of the northern half of Sakhalin, as she states, in order to hold security for reparation for this attack upon her nationals. She makes no claim of right to Sakhalin, but holds it only for the purpose of getting reparation for the massacre of her nationals. I am stating her position.

Mr. FRANCE. I would say that I was quite aware of the fact that all of Sakhalin was formerly Russian territory. I did not remember at the moment under what conditions the Japanese had acquired sovereignty over the southern portion of the island; but does not the Senator think that this question of Sakhalin might possibly develop into a serious controversy between Japan and Russia, which might involve a war?

Mr. LODGE. I can not possibly tell about future wars. I know it can not involve the United States. What involves Russia and Japan I have to bear with such philosophy as I may possess.

Mr. FRANCE. Unfortunately, countries are not always able to determine whether they shall have war or not.

Mr. LODGE. Are they not? I think the United States is able to determine it.

Mr. FRANCE. Sometimes nations have war thrust upon them, unfortunately, under conditions which prevail, conditions which I hope may be corrected.

Mr. LODGE. Now I return to the point at which I was interrupted, as to just what this treaty covers.

I have here some tables I am going to ask to have printed. They have been very carefully prepared for me by my secretary at the conference, Mr. Laughlin. The figures and other data were furnished by the hydrographic office of the Navy Department and by the Bureau of Eastern Affairs of the State Department. I think that they are nearly as correct in point of areas and population as it is possible to be, although it is very difficult to get the exact populations of these islands. I will read only enough to show in round numbers the areas and the populations and then I shall ask to have the tables printed, both in respect to these islands and the mandated islands of the Pacific. They contain information which I think will be very valuable to the Senate.

I will simply call attention to the total areas in square miles of the islands covered by this treaty. These are the possessions of the various powers in the Pacific after the war, corrected according to the mandates.

The United States has 126,000 square miles and 10,627,000 population.

The total British Empire, including Australia's and New Zealand's possessions, not the islands of Australia and New Zealand themselves, has 191,000 square miles and 1,491,000 population.

The Anglo-French condominium has an area of 6,000 square miles and about 60,000 population.

France has 8,588 square miles and 79,000 population.

The Netherlands has 683,000 square miles and 47,000,000 population.

Portugal has 7,330 square miles and 378,000 population.

Japan has 27,214 square miles and 3,606,000 population.

It will be observed that the Netherlands, for whose possessions provision was made by an exchange of notes, has the largest area and far the largest population. The next is the British Empire, with 191,000 square miles, but with only 1,491,000 population.

The United States is third, five times Japan's area, with 126,000 square miles and 10,000,000 population.

I read these to show the comparative interest of the United States in the Pacific islands.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statement the Senator from Massachusetts has just read shows that both the Netherlands and Portugal have substantial possessions in the regions of the Pacific indicated.

Mr. LODGE. The Portuguese possessions are very small.

Mr. ROBINSON. Particularly the Netherlands have substantial possessions in the regions of the Pacific comprehended by this treaty. Why were they not invited to participate in the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. In the case of Portugal it was because their interest was a very small one, indeed. In the case of the Netherlands, specific notes were written by the powers extending a pledge to respect the possessions of the Netherlands.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why were not the Netherlands included in the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Because their islands are almost all in the Indian Ocean, and not in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. REED. Did we join in such a note as the Senator speaks of?

Mr. LODGE. We did. The note is printed.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been dealing with the areas of the possessions of the various countries in the Pacific. I have forgotten the figures he gave with reference to the United States.

Mr. LODGE. One hundred and twenty-six thousand square miles, and 10,000,000 population, in round numbers.

Mr. REED. That includes the Philippines, does it not?

Mr. LODGE. That includes the Philippines and Hawaii. I will give the Senator the exact figures.

Mr. REED. How about the island of Wake?

Mr. LODGE. I will give the Senator the exact figures. They cover the Philippines, Hawaii, Guam, American Samoa—that is, the island of Tutuila—and Wake Island, 4 square miles, and population negligible.

Mr. REED. All that territory we had before the European war?

Mr. LODGE. We did.

Mr. REED. That was ours. Every foot of the territory acquired as a result of this war is by these treaties turned over to Japan or Great Britain, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. We have made no treaty with Great Britain. That is to come.

Mr. REED. Every foot of it?

Mr. LODGE. As to the mandated islands we recognize the mandates of Japan. The islands are very small and trifling in value and population.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator give the area of the islands that Japan acquired by virtue of the European war?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. In round numbers it is 1,000 square miles and 47,000 population in all of them.

Mr. KING. I think the area given by the Senator is too large.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the area is quite as much as that just stated, but I will give the exact area:

The mandated islands of Japan include the Caroline Islands, in which the Pelews are included, the Mariana or Ladrone Islands, and the Marshall Islands.

Germany attempted seizure of the Carolines in 1885. Spain objected. The matter was referred to the Pope for arbitration and decision rendered in favor of Spain. Germany finally secured the Carolines and the Marianas (except Guam) by purchase from Spain in 1899 for about $4,000,000. The Marshall Islands were secured by Germany in 1885 by occupation from native chiefs, and the acquisition was not contested.

I have the exact figures for Japan:

The islands which Japan now holds as a mandate include all the former German islands north of the Equator; that is, all the Carolines, the Marianas, with the exception of the most important one, Guam, and the Marshalls with the exception of Nauru (included in the British mandate) which has the greatest economic value of the group, on account of its extensive deposits of phosphates.

These three archipelagoes consist of hundreds of small scattered islands, the Marshalls being low-lying coral islands, the Marianas of volcanic origin, their highest elevation ranging from 1,000 to 3,000 feet, and the Carolines chiefly atolls, some of the larger islands of this group having high volcanic peaks in the center.

The Carolines (which include the island of Yap) consist of about 500 islands and islets with a total area of about 550 square miles. This archipelago consists of a number of good, though small, well-protected harbors and extended anchorages within some of the lagoons.

The Marianas, or Ladrones, consist of 15 principal islands, of which only 8 are inhabited, with a total area of about 241 square miles. They contain practically no good harbors, with the exception of that of the island of Guam. The population of the Marianas, exclusive of Guam, is about 2,650, and that of the Carolines about 40,000.

The Marshall group consists of over 30 atolls with an estimated population of 15,000 and an area of about 160 square miles.

Totals: There are about 550 islands with an area of about 950 square miles and a population of about 56,650. That is the entire Japanese mandate.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator how many harbors there are in these islands?

Mr. LODGE. I just read that.

Mr. REED. The Senator read with reference to one group and not with reference to all.

Mr. LODGE. With reference to the Carolines it is said:

This archipelago contains a number of good, though small, well-protected harbors and extended anchorages within some of the lagoons.

The Marianas or Ladrones "contain practically no good harbors, with the exception of that of the island of Guam." The Marshall Islands I think contain nothing. They are very trivial islands.

These tables and statements I ask to have printed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, passing from the islands covered by the treaty I come to the main point, which is the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance by the terms of the treaty. It will be noticed that the Anglo-Japanese alliance is terminated. There is no relation whatever between the Anglo-Japanese alliance and this treaty in character or in terms.

The agreement between the United Kingdom and Japan in article 2, provides that—

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once go to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

That is a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive. There is nothing of that sort in the four-power treaty. The removal or the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance was necessary to the successful conclusion of the naval treaty. The only obligation in the four-power treaty, in my judgment, and I think I express the views of the other American delegates, is the obligation to consult in the case of controversy or of aggression from a power outside the treaty. All decisions must be unanimous.

I say there is no alliance, and I make that statement broadly and with the full consciousness of what it means. It is idle to take the loose dictionary definition that an alliance is a compact between nations. An alliance in international law is a perfectly well understood form of agreement between nations. If we take the loose general interpretation that it is a compact between nations, it would mean that when we agreed to an extradition treaty with Costa Rica the other day we made an alliance with Costa Rica. That is absurd on its face.

When Washington spoke about a "permanent alliance" he was not referring to a treaty with another power to settle specific questions. He had just made a treaty with England, the famous Jay treaty, by which he settled certain questions in the West Indies and removed the British posts which were thwarting our western advance. Do you imagine when he made that treaty, which was permanent in its character, that he regarded it as a permanent alliance? He regarded it as a treaty for a specific purpose to settle certain outstanding questions. When Jefferson referred in his first inaugural address to an "entangling alliance" he did not have in mind treaties, of which there were more than one made in his time; he did not have in mind the treaties of commerce and amity for the exchange of consuls or ministers, or anything of that sort. He had in mind that which is a real alliance and what the whole world knows is meant by an alliance. When we had the exchange of the Rush-Bagot notes in 1821, those notes were approved by the Senate. They settled the question of armed vessels on the Lakes, limiting them to such a point that there are practically no armed vessels on the Great Lakes. That agreement made by note has lasted for a century unquestioned. Does anybody consider that an alliance? It is a simple agreement as to certain arrangements in regard to the Great Lakes in which the two countries, Canada and the United States, have a joint interest. An alliance is when two countries are bound to act together under certain given conditions, which may be offensive or defensive, or both. We can find any number of purely offensive alliances where countries join together to conduct a war, and for no other purpose. We can find purely defensive alliances, and we can find alliances which contain both agreements, and those are also true alliances because they bind the nations to perform certain acts under certain contingencies and put force behind them. There is absolutely nothing of that sort here and no torturing of words can put it here.

It was recognized by all the signers that this was the true interpretation. I say that because official declarations were made. In presenting the treaty to the conference I made the statement that no force lurked in those paragraphs, that it was not a treaty of alliance. That was accepted without question by all the signatories and all seated at that table. It was accepted a second time when the records of that meeting were approved at the next plenary conference. It was stated again in the report of the delegation. It was stated again by the President. No signatory of that treaty and no one of the nine powers assembled in Washington ever has questioned it and none ever will, in my judgment, question that interpretation.

Let me, in this connection, read a brief paragraph from Frank Simonds, whose writings on all these subjects are very well known, who speaks with authority, who was not particularly friendly to the Washington Conference, but who, after it was all done, made this statement:

Thus amended the four-power pact provides for peace in the Pacific, guaranteed by a mutual pledge of all the signatory powers to respect the integrity of the territory of each, and in case of difference between the signatory nations to confer. In the case of difficulties between a signatory power and a nonsignatory nation the four powers are to exchange notes as among the four, explaining the situation and looking to a common policy.

With the ratification of this four-power treaty, then, there will disappear any real cause or opportunity for war between the four great sea powers in the Pacific. Arrangements have also been made for separate agreements between the signatory powers and Holland to extend to the Dutch East Indian possessions that same guaranty of protection and recognition of integrity which the four-power treaty bestows upon the signatory nations. This agreement removes one of the gravest criticisms leveled at the four-power treaty, and it is an act of signal justice to Holland, whose participation in the conference was distinguished and whose interests in the region of the Pacific, at least on the material side, are more considerable than those of any other western nation.

In sum, then, we have as a result of the four-power treaty and the extension of this treaty to the Dutch East Indies a solid basis for peace between Japan, Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States. It is inconceivable hereafter during the life of a treaty that any difference of opinion or conflict of interests can lead to war. A regional agreement has been made, satisfactory and honorable to all concerned, entered into in full peace, representing no infrangements of the rights or alienation of the territories of any signatory nation, which must hereafter serve as a model for all regional agreements.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended; but before I close I desire to tell the Senate with entire frankness of the attitude and views of the American delegation in regard to this treaty. For a month and more before the conference met the American delegation was in session almost every day. We discussed the subjects to come before the conference and especially the difficult and detailed subject of the reduction of naval armaments. We tried to determine and mark out the course which the American delegation, with whom rested the responsibility of initiating all the work of the conference, should follow. Let me also mention what I think all the world knows that the American delegation was in complete accord as to the policies to be pursued and, although they discussed every question, great and small, carefully and elaborately, they remained in complete accord and without any differences as to what should be done. The shadow of politics or of personal feeling never rested for a moment upon the deliberations of the American delegation. They were there simply as Americans to do their utmost to serve their country, and they believed that in serving their country as best they could they would best serve mankind.

Let me first say that the American delegation were united in the desire to secure results from the conference which would promote the peace of the world, reduce in some measure the burdens of taxation imposed by the existence of armies and fleets and the competition of armaments, and protect the future peace and safety of the United States. We were of one mind in agreeing that if we were to have any measure of success in securing the results for which we hoped from the conference we must think in terms of peace and not in terms of war. If we had thought in terms of war, there was no use in conferences or efforts for the maintenance of peace. It was our earnest hope that in a portion of the earth's surface at least we could do something to substitute the assurance of peace for the arrangements and calculations of war and in so doing keep clear of all alliances of any sort which are in their very nature ultimate breeders of war and which always have hidden behind them penalties and force.

Actuated by these beliefs and by this spirit we were clearly of opinion that there lay before us three great objectives, three dominant purposes to be attained. One was the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The next was an agreement between the five principal allied and associated powers seated at the table for a reduction of naval armament. The third was to accomplish all that was possible to aid China in such ways as to help her in the establishment of a free and independent government and particularly to secure the restoration of the great Province of Shantung to the Chinese Empire, to which it rightfully belonged. We succeeded before the close of the conference in attaining all these objects. The treaty now before us terminates the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Personally I believe, as I have already indicated, that it involves the United States in no obligation except to meet with the other signatories and consult in case of any controversy arising or in case of aggression by some outside power not a signatory. I repeat that I think the obligation to meet and consult is the only obligation existing in this treaty, and the main purpose of the treaty is attained by the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

It is not necessary for me to go into detail as to the reasons for my opinion as to the great importance of this single achievement. It is sufficient to say that in my judgment the Anglo-Japanese alliance was the most dangerous element in our relations with the Far East and with the Pacific. Wars come from suspicions which develop into hatreds and hatreds which develop into wars. The Anglo-Japanese alliance caused a growing feeling of suspicion not only in the United States but in Canada. On the other side it tended to give a background to Japan which encouraged the war spirit and large preparations both by land and sea for future conflict. It immobilized England and prevented the exercise of her influence in the east for the cause of peace, and peace is distinctly in her interest in that great region. That menace to peace is removed by the four-power treaty. I have already shown the total difference which exists between this treaty and the Anglo-Japanese alliance. There is no likeness between that alliance and this treaty. Far from taking the place of the other, this treaty simply enabled England and Australia and New Zealand to take part in terminating the alliance. The removal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which is complete, created the situation in which it was possible to bring about an agreement for the reduction of naval armament. While that alliance existed a reduction of naval armament was difficult, if not impracticable. Senators should bear in mind that the defeat of the four-power treaty would endanger the treaty for the limitation of naval armament, and the failure of the naval treaty would shock and startle the world and bitterly disappoint the American people. We must not forget the close relation between the two treaties. The defeat of the four-power treaty would mean the failure of the conference. Let there be no illusion on that point. The purpose of the American delegation in the conference, and, I think, of all other members of the conference besides those of the United States, was to endeavor to do something at once practical and concrete which would promote the peace of the world. They believed that this could be done without alliances or penalties. I felt very strongly, and I believe I am expressing the feelings of my colleagues, that the time had come to make this experiment. I do not mean to say that such experiments have not been made in the past in isolated instances, but I venture to assert that never has the experiment been attempted on such a scale or under similar conditions. We hope and believe that agreements resting on the good faith, the honest purpose, and the highest aspirations of nations and peoples, carried out as they have been here, will have a permanent and lasting effect. We have passed through a war the like of which the world has never seen. The sacrifice of human life, of the young men upon whom the future of the race depended, the destruction of property, the dislocation of the social and industrial fabric, the suffering and poverty bequeathed to the world by the Great War, stagger the imagination. The misery and the horrors of the Great War must never come again if we can do anything to stop it. We must try our best to secure this beneficent result. We who have passed through the valley of the shadow in these last years must leave nothing undone that we can do to save our children and our children's children from the awful calamity which we of this generation have been compelled to endure. It was with this hope, with this purpose, that the conference met.

I know it is only a beginning. I know it is only an experiment, but I have faith to believe that the better instincts of mankind are all with us in the effort. If we continue to preach suspicion and hatred of other nations, if we decline to deal with them and feel in our hearts that they are all actuated by the basest of motives, nothing can ever be done. But if we are right in thinking that men and women alike have learned the lesson of the war, then much can be accomplished by the agreements reached in Washington, and the door will stand open for further attempts to breed a larger kindliness and a more forbearing spirit among the nations of the earth and in this way help us to take further and ever more assured and steady steps in the same direction. I have faith to believe that this effort, illustrated by this treaty now before us, will have a large and real result in maintaining the world's peace. I believe it can be done in this way without alliances or penalties or the sanction of force lurking in the background. If we fail, the outlook for the future is dark indeed, but if we succeed, and I think we shall succeed, the future of mankind will be brightened and we may hope to leave behind us a better world than that which has been wounded, maimed, and tortured by the Great War which closed in November, 1918.

The best hope of the world for a future where peace may prevail and wars diminish is in the people of the United States. If we fail, who can hope to succeed? We called this conference. We proposed the treaties, agreements, and declarations in which the conference culminated. Are we now to stumble and fall at the threshold of the undertaking which we designed and brought to fulfillment? Are we to sink back into a sullen solitude, a prey to dark suspicions, a hermit nation armed to the teeth and looking forward always to wars as inseparable from the existence of mankind upon the earth? Untrammeled and unhampered, free from the hatreds and rivalries of Europe, we have believed that we could best help the world of men beyond our gates by maintaining our own strength and complete independence. If we can not do this, then no one can, and the clouds of war will again settle heavily over the future of civilization. This must not be. The United States has never yet permitted failure or defeat to be written in her history. She will not permit it now. Under her lead a beginning has been made to secure the world's peace in the coming years. Let us not blight or wither this new hope.

Can we not say now, as we have always said, to a doubting, weary, and waiting world:

> And not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light,
> In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
> But westward, look, the land is bright.

APPENDIX.

MANDATES IN THE PACIFIC OCEAN.

JAPANESE MANDATE.

The islands which Japan now holds as a mandate include all of the former German islands north of the Equator; that is, all of the Carolines, the Marianas, with the exception of the most important one—Guam—and the Marshalls, with the exception of Nauru, included in the British mandate, which has the greatest economic value of the group on account of its extensive deposits of phosphates.

These three archipelagoes consist of hundreds of small, scattered islands, the Marshalls being low-lying coral islands; the Marianas of volcanic origin, their highest elevation ranging from 1,000 to 3,000 feet; and the Carolines, chiefly atolls, some of the larger islands of this group having high volcanic peaks in the center.

The Carolines, which include the island of Yap, consist of about 500 islands and islets, with a total area of about 550 square miles. This archipelago contains a number of good, though small, well-protected harbors and extended anchorages within some of the lagoons.

The Marianas, or Ladrones, consist of 15 principal islands, of which only 8 are inhabited, with a total area of about 241 square miles. They contain practically no good harbors, with the exception of that of the island of Guam. The population of the Marianas, exclusive of Guam, is about 2,650, and that of the Carolines about 40,000.

The Marshall group consists of over 30 atolls, with an estimated population of 15,000 and an area of about 160 square miles.

TOTALS.

Islands: About 550.
Area: About 950 square miles.
Population: About 56,650.

BRITISH MANDATE.

The island of Nauru was granted as a mandate to the British Empire. It is geographically considered as a part of the Marshall group and is situated just below the Equator. It has an area of about 10 square miles and a population in 1916 of 2,101. Its importance is due entirely to its extensive and deep phosphate deposits.

AUSTRALIA.

The mandate held by Australia includes all the former German possessions in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator with the exception of German Samoa (New Zealand mandate) and Nauru (British Empire). That is, it comprises Kaiser Wilhelms Land, the Bismarck Archipelago, and the northern Solomon Islands. The actual number of islands is indeterminate, but their total area is about 91,810 square miles, approximately the size of the States of New York and Pennsylvania combined. The greater portion of this area is comprised in Kaiser Wilhelms Land (70,000 square miles), the northeastern portion of the island of New Guinea. The population of the islands included in the Australian mandate is approximately something over 500,000.

NEW ZEALAND.

The New Zealand mandate consists of the two main islands of the Samoan Group, Savaii, and Upolu, with a few much smaller ones. Their area is about 1,000 square miles, and the present population about 35,000.

TOTALS.

Islands: Ten principal islands (some of which, such as New Britain, in the Bismarck Archipelago, with an area of about 10,000 square miles, are of considerable size), about a quarter of the island of New Guinea, and an indeterminate number of small islets.
Area: About 92,820 square miles.
Population: About 540,000.

MEMORANDUM ON THE MANDATED ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC.

(Particulars: Answers to Senator LODGE'S questions.)

Question. The mandated islands of Japan (the Caroline Islands, in which the Pelews are included, the Mariana or Ladrone Islands, and the Marshall Islands) all from Germany?—Answer. Yes.

Question. Did Germany get them all from Spain or where?—Answer. Germany attempted seizure of the Carolines in 1885. Spain objected. The matter was referred to the pope for arbitration, and decision rendered in favor of Spain. Germany finally secured the Carolines and the Marianas (except Guam) by purchase from Spain in 1899 for about $4,000,000. The Marshall Islands were secured by Germany in 1885 by occupation from native chiefs, and the acquisition was not contested.

Question. Where did the Marshall Islands come from?—Answer. See above.

Question. Mandated islands south of the Equator all from Germany?—Answer. Yes.

Question. Where did Germany get them and when?—Answer. The island of Nauru (now included in the British mandate) was secured by occupation in 1888 directly from native chiefs.

NEW ZEALAND MANDATE.

Former German Samoa, now called Western Samoa. Germany had various claims to these and neighboring islands, finally adjusted by the convention of December 2, 1899, between the United States, Great Britain, and Germany.

AUSTRALIAN MANDATE.

Former German New Guinea (Kaiser Wilhelm's Land), together with the adjacent islands, more particularly the Bismarck Archipelago, the northern Solomon, and the Admiralty group, were obtained from the natives after a long dispute with Great Britain, lasting from 1884 to 1886.

[NOTE.—The United States possesses the island of Tutuila, in the Samoan Group, with the harbor of Pago-Pago, the best natural naval base in the Pacific, which was secured by the treaty of 1878. (See Malloy, Treaties, II, 1574.)]

PACIFIC ISLANDS—AREAS AND POPULATIONS.

Explanatory notes to accompany table giving areas and populations in the Pacific.

REGION COVERED.

The region covered is, broadly speaking, "The Pacific," though in certain cases, notably that of the Dutch East Indies, the islands extend into the Indian Ocean. Authorities differ as to the exact line of demarcation between the Pacific and Indian Oceans. It was thought best, however, to include the entire Dutch islands in the tabulation.

AREAS CONSIDERED.

The areas and populations are given for the principal islands and island groups. No attempt has been made to prepare estimates covering small uninhabited islands and rocks.

CHARACTER OF DATA.

It will be readily understood that data regarding areas and populations in the South Seas are more difficult to obtain and relatively not so accurate as that which may be procured with respect to other regions. The data in this schedule, however, are taken from the best authorities and cover the latest census reports, which range from 1910 to 1914. The round figures given are naturally estimates, but on the whole the information may be regarded as substantially accurate.

UNITED STATES.

All of the island possessions of the United States are given except the Aleutian Islands, which are usually considered as part of Alaska.

JAPAN.

The area and population of Japan proper includes those of the Kurile Islands (area, 6,068; population, 500,000) and the Luchu Islands (area, 900; population, 571,000), which are usually regarded as an integral part of Japan.

GERMANY.

The various prewar possessions of Germany have been allocated by mandate as follows:

Kaiser Wilhelm's Land to Australia.
Bismarck Archipelago to Australia.
Caroline and Pelew Islands to Japan.
Mariana Islands (except Guam) to Japan.
Marshall Islands (except Nauru) to Japan.
Nauru Island to Great Britain.
German Samoa to New Zealand.

NOTE.

Marshall Islands (except Nauru), area 167, population 9,500.
Nauru, area 9, population 1,500.

NOTE.

This result shows a small discrepancy of 7 miles less in area and a difference of about 290,000 fewer in population, which may be explained by the fact that some areas and populations are given by the various authorities as merely approximate; furthermore, some of the population statistics are not only estimates but about 10 years old, and the populations of given areas in the Pacific islands seem to be subject to great fluctuations.

Nearly all of the difference in population is to be found in the statistics given for Kaiser Wilhelmsland (German New Guinea) and the Bismarck Archipelago.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question or two if he will permit me.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very glad to answer if I can.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that this treaty does not bind us to any action unless there shall be unanimous agreement.

Mr. LODGE. No; I did not say that, Mr. President. I said that all agreements must be unanimous.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. Unanimous or not, I do not think it binds us to anything.

Mr. REED. Very well. All agreements, then, which would or might bind us, must be unanimous?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. REED. That, of course, is not expressed in the language of the treaty as the treaty now is drawn. Would the Senator object to a plain statement in the form of a reservation or amendment stating that no country shall be bound by any action at any conference without its consent?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that any reservation is necessary; but I agreed to a reservation proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and for that reservation I shall vote.

Mr. REED. Very well. If the treaty does not bind us to any action that may be agreed upon at any conference between the four powers, then of course it does not bind any other power without its consent.

Mr. LODGE. Obviously.

Mr. REED. The result of the whole matter, therefore, is that if a dispute arises between the four powers or any of them with reference to any question, a conference will be called, and the action of the conference will be binding upon no nation unless that nation wants to be bound?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. REED. If, then, Japan were to attack the United States, and if a conference were called by the United States to consider the action of Japan, Great Britain and France would sit down at the table with us and with Japan and talk the matter over, but they would be under no obligation whatsoever?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this treaty does not touch in any way the continental possessions of the United States. It applies only to the islands. Let us keep it where it belongs.

Mr. REED. Very well; I will keep it exactly where it belongs. If Japan were to attack the Hawaiian Islands or the Philippine Islands or Guam, and the United States were to ask a conference such as is contemplated in the treaty, and Great Britain and France came to that conference, although they might believe that Japan's attack was wanton, without cause, they would be under no obligation to insist that Japan should cease her attack?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if an act of war is committed by one power on another, that is a question of an act of war. It would not come before this conference at all.

Mr. REED. Why would it not come before this conference, under this language?

Mr. LODGE. When one nation attacks another, it does not go before any conference.

Mr. REED. Why does it not come within this language:

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

That language does not except war; it includes war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it excepts war absolutely and necessarily.

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. LODGE. Because if one country attacks another, that is not a controversy to be settled by diplomacy and waiting for six months. It has to be met at once.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. The treaty is not a foolish thing.

Mr. REED. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps not. It may strike the Senator as foolish. He did not make it.

Mr. REED. No. The Senator does not assume any superior wisdom about this matter.

Mr. LODGE. Not a bit.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Missouri is trying to get the viewpoint of the Senator from Massachusetts and is trying to proceed with due politeness and with the courtesy that ought to exist between gentlemen, even if they are Senators. I asked the Senator a very plain question, which can not be answered by a sneer.

Mr. LODGE. I had no intention of answering it by a sneer—none whatever. I answered it to the best of my ability, that I do not think there is anything in the point.

Mr. REED. (Reading:)

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question—

Why does not that controversy include war?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it does, and I do not think anybody could torture it into that meaning. If the fleet of Japan were to attack the Hawaiian Islands, that would be an act of war. It would not be a controversy to be discussed under this treaty.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then we agree that if Japan were to attack any of the American possessions—the Philippine Islands, Guam, Wake, or the Hawaiian Islands—that attack is not included at all within this treaty and does not come within the jurisdiction or the terms of the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. I do not regard it as a controversy for discussion or that can be so regarded.

Mr. REED. Very well. So we know now, to start on, that this proposed treaty will not bring to our aid or to our assistance, either at the council table or upon the high seas, a single whit of protection in the event of an attack.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is not a treaty of alliance in any sense.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Senator understands that the case he quotes would of itself be a violation of the treaty. Of course, if Japan attacks our islands in the Pacific, she violates the first article of the treaty, which is that each of us will respect the possessions of the other.

Mr. REED. Exactly. She violates the first article of the treaty, and yet the Senator from Massachusetts insists that the other signatories to the treaty are in no manner bound to proceed against her for that violation.

Mr. LODGE. They are not bound to proceed to war for that violation.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a treaty of alliance. We are not bound to proceed to their help and they are not bound to proceed to ours.

Mr. REED. Under no obligation, moral or legal or in any other way?

Mr. LODGE. Moral or legal.

Mr. REED. Very well. I am glad to know that, because I have now had removed from my mind the conclusion which has been insisted upon by the press, that this treaty is so drawn that if Japan should ever attack us we would have the protection of all these other nations. We know now that we will get no protection from them.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I do not know what has been insisted upon in the press. Many burdens are put on the press, but I have not seen a newspaper yet that has made the suggestion the Senator has just made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not the Senator also learn that if the arrangements contemplated by these treaties are effectuated, and Japan should violate her treaty and attack us, we would have placed ourselves in the meantime where it would be impossible for us to defend our island possessions?

Mr. REED. I understand that that would be absolutely the case, except with reference to the Hawaiian Islands, which we probably could defend, although we would have placed them in a position of much greater danger than they would be in if we proceeded to the fortification of Guam.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this treaty; but while I am on my feet I think it important to call attention to what has just been developed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There must be some misunderstanding, must there not, on the other side as to what this treaty does mean, since the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] stated here months ago that it would add to our protection on the Pacific coast?

Mr. REED. Why, undoubtedly, there seems to have been a general misunderstanding.

Allow me, for a few moments, to deal with the matter. I am not going to try to discuss the treaty, but simply to sum up the statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts, denude them of their poetic fancies, and reduce them to plain, hard English.

First, the treaty as drawn binds no nation to do any one thing except to sit down and talk. As the result of the talk they may agree and they may not agree, and no nation is to be bound in any way unless by its own consent.

Second, if any nation violates the treaty and attacks the insular possessions of any other nation, it can do so without the slightest interference by the other signatories to the treaty except the one whose territory has been attacked, and it is left exactly where it was before the treaty was made, namely, it must proceed to its own defense single-handed and alone; and yet we are told that this treaty guarantees the peace of the Pacific and guarantees us from attack. The solitary thing agreed upon is, that in the event a dispute arises between the powers, they agree to talk it over, and that when they have talked it over they are not obliged to do anything—to do a single act of any kind or character, to pursue any kind of policy that may be agreed upon. The two nations engaged in the controversy may proceed with the controversy exactly the same as though this treaty never had been written. Moreover, if the nations signing this treaty do not come together in conference in accordance with its terms, there is no obligation resting upon any of the nations to do anything whatsoever to the nation that has refused to comply with its agreement to come in and talk matters over. Again, the whole controversy is left to a settlement between the two nations directly concerned. That is to say, we have done absolutely nothing except to agree that we will talk over certain matters. Wherein does this agreement change the present situation?

At the present time we have treaties of peace with every one of these countries. In nearly every instance, and with nearly every country, there is an agreement already in existence by which the United States already agrees to talk controversies over, and in some instances agreements of arbitration exist. There is an agreement in every instance, I think, with all of these nations, except, perhaps, with Great Britain, for a lapse of time which must exist before an act of war is committed.

Since we have these separate agreements with all of these powers to-day, of what value or virtue is the further provision that four of them will meet to talk matters over instead of the nations dealing directly, each with the others? Always they could call upon other nations if they saw fit to arbitrate, and provisions for arbitration, as I have said, have already been made. This is the guaranty of the peace of the Pacific!

The Yap treaty, so called, and there never was a greater misnomer, confirms the title of Japan to all of the German islands which were seized in the north Pacific. It brings Japan something like 3,000 miles nearer the coast of the United States. It gives her command of two belts of islands lying between Hawaii and the Philippines. We have not reserved one single foot of that ground. That was called the Yap treaty, and Yap was in fact only a flyspeck. The great thing Japan secured was the complete dominance of all of these islands—the Marshall Islands, the Caroline Islands, and the other islands which make up these archipelagos.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that neither he nor any of his associates gave any consideration to the strategic importance of the question, a singular admission to be made by a man who has been dealing with the question of war and with the question of disarmament. I warrant you that there was no Jap statesman here stupid enough to not give consideration to the strategic importance of these islands. We now find that we have not even a paper guaranty from any nation to come to the defense of the United States in case it is attacked, and under those circumstances, without considering the strategic importance of what we were doing, we have proceeded to yield to Japan the absolute control of all of the islands in the north Pacific which she secured as the result of the war and which we were as much entitled to as she was.

We have not considered the strategic importance, I suppose, of any other islands, and the other treaties which are part of this same plan provide that we shall not proceed with our fortifications in Guam, and, as I understand, they stop our fortifications in the Philippines.

If we fail to complete these fortifications, Japan, bound by this treaty no more than she was bound by previous treaties of peace with us, could attack and take the Philippines or Guam in less than a week's time. We never could retake the Philippines without retaking Guam, which Japan can fortify in one week's time; so that probably we could never retake it except at a frightful cost. We can not proceed to retake the Philippines without first taking Guam, for the simple reason that the distance is so great that our vessels can not traverse the immense distance, fight a battle, and return to our own shores without recoaling, and there will be no place to recoal.

I agree that our representatives did not consider the strategic importance; yet they seek to disarm us, to deprive us of fortifications, to deprive us of bases, to deprive us of points where we can outfit our vessels and replenish them with coal.

Let it go to the country now that this treaty guarantees us nothing except talk around a council board, that any nation seeing fit not to come to that conference can remain outside, and that no other nation is under the slightest obligation, moral or otherwise, to insist that the nations signing this agreement shall keep faith and abide by the terms of the agreement.

Let it be understood that we have a paper agreement, in which we agree to do nothing to any nation which does not abide by the terms of this agreement, and that what we have here is a paper transaction, without an obligation back of it that anybody or any nation is bound to observe under penalty of incurring the displeasure and punishment of the other signatories to the treaty. Let that be understood, and then we will know what a farce was enacted here if that conception be the correct conception.

The distinguished Senator is driven to that position, because he dare not stand before this body or before the country and say that they have made an agreement binding America to do anything. In order to escape from that conclusion, he is driven to the further statement that the treaty binds no nation to do anything. Yet, as a part of this treaty, he proposes that we shall sink our men-of-war, that we shall cease to fortify our possessions, and that in the end we have nothing to trust to but the Punic faith of Japan, a country which invariably attacks before it declares war.

All the beautiful sentences which may be coined will not do away with the grim reality we must face. How many glorious speeches were made about the permanent peace of the world, about Christian civilization having advanced to the point where war would never come? How many songs of peace were composed? How many mothers were going about singing, "I did not raise my boy to be a soldier"? How many pacifists were upon the platform telling this country that it never would be in war and that the world would never be brought to war again? Yet a single shot was fired in a remote Province of Europe, and that shot lighted the conflagration into which we were finally drawn.

If this treaty had solemnly engaged the four powers each to protect the peace of the Pacific, it would, of course, have imposed an obligation upon us to which I might have objected and to which others who do not believe in alliances might have objected; but it at least would have furnished an argument that we were guaranteed against attack by the solemn faith of all the signatories to the compact. We are told, however, that the compact contains no agreement, gives us no assurance, and imposes no obligation except upon each nation that it will keep the faith. We already possess such agreements with nearly every one of the nations of the earth. They are already signed and laid up in the archives of our State Department.

The Senator from Massachusetts says we began this program, and therefore we must carry it through; that America never fails. Who began it? Did the American people begin it? No. Did the American Congress begin it? No. This body passed a resolution asking for a disarmament conference. It did not ask for a four-power treaty. This body asked for consideration of the question of disarmament. It did not ask for a Chinese pact. The President saw fit to call this conference and to enlarge it. If we, then, do not subscribe to that which he and the men he named have brought forth, is America failing? Are we obliged to proceed because America never fails? That is a strange argument to come from the lips of the Senator from Massachusetts, for I remember another President, who went to a much greater conference than this, who had a plan, and who insisted that that plan was America's plan. He also, I suppose, thought that America should not fail; yet, with all the sagacity, with all the shrewdness, with all the tireless energy of which he was possessed, the senior Senator from Massachusetts sought to bring that to failure, because he said it was wrong. He did not then surrender and supinely fall in line and take step with the President upon the hypothesis that America could never begin anything and fail. We did not hear that argument then.

It is not a sound argument to-day, and it was not a sound argument then. The question is not whether the President has proposed something; the question is whether the thing proposed is a sound and a wise measure. That was the doctrine the Senator from Massachusetts talked when there was a Democratic President. Now he talks out of the other corner of his mouth.

It is an unsound doctrine. The business of the Senate, as a part of the treaty-making power, is to examine every proposed treaty upon its merits, and to pass upon it an independent, an unbiased, an unterrified judgment. It is not the business of the Senate to ratify any treaty on the theory that our country is bound because the President and four or five other individuals have embarked upon it. There are 110,000,000 people in this country, and every one of them is as much entitled to his judgment on a question of this kind as is the President himself, although the President is authorized to negotiate the treaty.

They are as much entitled to it as we are, although it is our business to examine the treaty and either approve or disapprove, as in our judgment we think we ought to do.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKINLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. The Senator has just concluded a statement to the effect that another enterprise which was called by an American President was resisted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I call attention to the fact that the other enterprise, the League of Nations, to which the Senator undoubtedly refers, was not an American proposal and it was not called by an American President at all. True, an American President participated, but the proposition did not originate with us at all.

Mr. REED. Oh, I am surprised that the Senator can make that statement. The President of the United States outlined his scheme of a league of nations months before the Versailles conference was called, and it is of record.

Mr. NEW. Oh, yes.

Mr. REED. It was in its essentials the language that afterwards came forth as part 1 of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. NEW. But it never was an American proposition at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit me to ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. What did the Senator mean in his speech the other day when he called this an association of nations?

Mr. NEW. I said it was an association, not a league. I never said it was a league.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No. The Senator said repeatedly that it was an association of nations.

Mr. NEW. That is right.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Can the Senator draw a distinction between an association of nations and a league of nations?

Mr. NEW. The Senator from Indiana certainly never, in that speech or anywhere else, said he believed that there was any similarity whatever between the present association and the League of Nations, and the Senator from Georgia does not think so either.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me again, the Senator not only called it repeatedly an association of nations, but he compared it specifically with what he called the Grand Design of Henry V, and said it was a stronger, more enduring association than the Grand Design of Queen Elizabeth and King Henry.

Mr. NEW. I think if the Senator from Georgia will do me the honor to read what I said the other day, he will see that the Senator from Indiana devoted a good deal of his speech to pointing out the differences between this association and the others, including the Grand Design.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, of course there are differences. The point on which the Senator from Indiana has just called me down is that I have said the League of Nations compact also originated in this country. I decline to take time to discuss a question that is so historically settled as that. It is true that the draft, perhaps, was from the pen of a South African general, but the plan was taken from this country; it was the one great thing that the President insisted upon specifically.

I do not say because the President insisted upon it that it should have been done then. What I say now is that because President Harding insists upon this treaty, it affords no greater reason why the treaty should be indorsed. This is not a one-man Government. It does not consist of a President. It is a Government of the people, established under the Constitution consisting of three coordinate branches, every one of them bound and circumscribed by the language of the Constitution.

But the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said that the treaty does away with the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Let us pause a moment and consider that. Has the United States reached the position that in order to get Great Britain to abrogate a treaty between herself and Japan we must enter into a treaty with four powers? Are we so helpless and so defenseless that we must resort to such means to protect ourselves?

The philosophy seems to be that of the old Irish politician in my town who found himself thoroughly beaten by his antagonist. He was consulted by one of his lieutenants who said to him, "Now, Pat, what are we going to do?" He said, "If we can't bate 'em, we must jine 'em."

So it seems to me that in this instance we must make a treaty to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. We are getting rid of nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Missouri or any other thinking person imagine that Japan and Great Britain, who have regarded the Anglo-Japanese alliance as of the greatest importance, would rescind or abandon it for a mere agreement of four nations to hold conversations?

Mr. REED. Why, certainly not. I was about to come to that point, but the Senator has stated it so well in his question that I will let it rest on the question. It answers itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Balfour, now Sir Arthur, and others in the conference stated publicly that the necessity for the Anglo-Japanese alliance had passed, or would pass with the ratification of this treaty, and that the reason why England had not rescinded the arrangement was the necessity for some treaty that would accomplish the same or substantially the same purpose in the regions affected by it.

Mr. FRANCE and Mr. ROBINSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is apparent that Japan and Great Britain did regard that treaty of sufficient importance to justify them in renouncing the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Mr. REED. Absolutely they renounced it. The Senator is right. It is a question which I propose to discuss in a moment.

I yield now to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I have been interested in what the Senator is saying and also the argument of the defenders of this treaty that a great boon to be derived from it is the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Is it not true that that treaty probably would have been abandoned anyhow under the pressure from representatives of the British colonies, and is it not true that the British Empire was practically prevented from renewing that agreement because of the position of the representatives of the colonies at the last imperial convention?

Mr. BORAH. Let us assume that so far as the written agreement known as the Anglo-Japanese alliance is concerned it terminates with the ratification of this treaty. Does anyone suppose that there will be any difference in the relationship between Great Britain and Japan by reason of the mere termination of the written instrument so long as Japan is pushing her interests in Siberia and so long as Great Britain owns India? The very object which brought them together and created the community of interests will be retained and supported by the physical conditions regardless of any written agreement; and it was for that reason, as Lloyd-George so well said, that the Anglo-Japanese alliance or some other situation would have to be produced, because they could not afford to announce to Japan that they even intended to attempt to dissolve the relationship which their community of interests in that region created. They will always act together, not because of contracts made and published but because they are bound together by a common program and a common interest. We may become a member of a common contract, but Great Britain and Japan will have their particular relationship and will hang together.

Mr. REED. I was about to offer a very similar observation, but it is well stated by the Senator and again I let it stand at that.

I call attention to the absurdity of saying that Japan and Great Britain were bound together by a treaty of such importance that they would not relinquish it unless a new treaty was made, and that the new treaty, having been made, binds no nation to do anything except to keep the peace which was already provided for in numerous treaties. For no such paltry consideration have they yielded a treaty which they regarded as important and paramount. In a word, the position that is taken is that England and Japan had something of great value, of great importance, and that they threw it aside for something of no value and of no importance. That is exactly the position in which Senators find themselves.

Now, replying to the inquiry of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], the Anglo-Japanese treaty and all such treaties were presumptively wiped out by the treaty of Versailles. While we did not sign that treaty, many other nations did, including Japan, Great Britain, and France. In the treaty series for September, 1920, published as a supplement to the official journal of the League of Nations I find this, under date of the 8th of July, 1920:

ANGLO-JAPANESE DECLARATION.

English official text of the Anglo-Japanese declaration forwarded on July 8, 1920, by the foreign office and the Japanese Government. The declaration was registered by the secretariat of the League of Nations on July 8, 1920.

The Governments of Great Britain and Japan have come to the conclusion that the Anglo-Japanese agreement of July 13, 1911, now existing between the two countries, though in harmony with the spirit of the covenant of the League of Nations, is not entirely consistent with the letter of that covenant, which both Governments earnestly desire to respect. They accordingly have the honor to inform the league that they recognize the principle that if the said agreement be continued after July, 1921, it must be in a form which is not inconsistent with that covenant.

(Signed) CHINDA.
(Signed) CURZON OF KEDLESTON.

So it appears that to all intents and purposes they had already agreed to rewrite their treaty.

Again I inquire, as I have several times inquired, and as I intend to continue to inquire, why we need fear the Anglo-Japanese alliance, supposing that it exists just as it is written? In the first place, the United States, as we well know, proposes to regard its treaty obligations with every country. It does not propose to steal an acre of land, and land stealing by land thieves has been the basis fundamentally of nearly every war that has been fought. We propose to stay at home and to attend to our own affairs. We want peace with all the world. If we are ever attacked by Japan or Great Britain, it would be a war of aggression, waged without cause. Are we to suppose, then, that if Japan were to attack the United States, Great Britain would join Japan in that attack because of the existence of the Anglo-Japanese treaty? If we are to suppose that, then let us for a moment examine the question.

In the World War England found herself with her back literally to the wall. France, with the enemy's feet upon her soil and the enemy's hand almost upon her throat, beheld her exhausted armies fall back day after day. These countries sent emissaries to this country and appealed to us to send at least a few regiments over, although we were unprepared, in order that the sight of the American soldier might hearten their people. That appeal was made in this Chamber by the representative of Great Britain, and the proud Britisher does not make an appeal of that kind until the situation is desperate. We sent our troops there. I do not intend to recount the story, but when the American troops had once taken their position upon the battle line the retreat ended. I do not claim that America alone won the World War, but I do claim that without America defeat of the allied armies was inevitable. We therefore came in with our arms, with our men, and with our money. We loaned them $10,000,000,000; we put our factories to work and produced the machinery of war. All that has been done. If that does not tie Great Britain to us by bonds stronger than treaty obligations, if that does not make Great Britain and France our friends forever, then all the words that can be put upon paper will be no guaranty. If Great Britain would join Japan in an attack upon the United States, then she is so base, she is so treacherous, that I would not trust her paper obligation. If the blood spilled upon the soil of France has not written an obligation deeper, more indelible than can ever be written upon parchment, then I will not trust the signature on the parchment.

Is there any danger of Great Britain joining Japan to attack us? If so, then some word stronger than the word "perfidy," some word stronger than the word "treachery," some word stronger than has ever yet been penned by man must be invented to describe the baseness of their souls, the treachery of their hearts, the sordid iniquity of a nation. I do not believe it, sir.

I have many times criticized the British Government; but the British people are a noble people, a courageous people, an intelligent people, and the British people would not permit any Government to embark on such an enterprise. Moreover, I do not believe that the Canadian people would permit it. I venture the statement that, if an unprovoked war were to be made upon us by Japan and if Great Britain were to call upon Canada to help a brown race attack the United States of America, Canada would be in a flame of revolt and would take her position beside the Christian civilization of North America as against the paganism of the Orient.

What would Australia do? We have been told that Australia and New Zealand are already so saturated with dislike and distrust of Japan that they exclude the Japanese from their soil. The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that they are so distrustful of Japan that they have insisted that this treaty should be made before the Anglo-Japanese alliance was wiped out.

I want to ask another question: What has become of the Franco-Japanese alliance? Is there any such alliance?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it exists.

Mr. REED. Is it wiped out?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. REED. I thought not.

So, Mr. President, the argument that there is no alliance, no binding agreement, no contract, simply brings us to this, that there is no protection except the good faith of each nation, and that good faith is already pledged in treaties, and pledged as solemnly as it is pledged in this treaty. Therefore, the argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts is that we meet, confer, spend six or eight months in deliberating, and end by doing nothing that binds anybody any further than they are already bound to-day. And this is the hope of the world! I have heard phrases of that kind very often. Let us see how much hope there is for the world in it.

There are four nations parties to this treaty. There never has been a quadruple alliance formed on this earth that has not brought forth another quadruple alliance; there has never been a quintuple alliance that has not brought forth another five-power or six-power alliance. The inevitable result of an alliance between four powers is an alliance between four or more other powers.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to ask the Senator also if it is not true that a mere entente between certain powers is often sufficient to bring about an alliance between the powers not included in the entente?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; but what is the difference between ententes and alliances? Why cavil about terms? In each case they are mere understandings, and they are made no more binding by having been written in harsh terms than if they are written in general terms.

The long story of the ages proceeds with one unbroken line of precedents. Combinations between two nations produce counter combinations. It is the law of self-defense. It is true of individuals. It has brought peoples together in tribes, and the combination of tribes has produced opposing combinations of tribes; and combinations between nations have produced opposing combinations between nations. There is no exception to the rule in all history; there will be no exception to the rule in this instance.

You propose a combination between four nations, and no matter how much honey may be put upon the tongues of its advocates, every wise man who is the leader of another nation will know that the treaty is intended to mean something, and he will give it its worst construction. He will say, "the four great powerful nations of the world, two of them the most imperialistic nations that have existed since the days of Rome, are parties to that treaty; they are backed by the most puissant power there is in the world, the United States." He will ask himself, "What does this mean except that in case of a dispute in the Pacific Ocean these other powers will be massed against us?" He will know, more than that. No war can be confined to the waters of any sea, and a combination which controls the Pacific will be found to be interested in every controversy arising between first-class nations wheresoever they may be. So you are as certain to produce a combination between Germany and Russia, and perhaps other powers, as day is to follow night. You are forcing into each other's arms the two giants of the eastern world—one of them to-day prostrate because she was conquered in the war, the other prostrate because she was exhausted by the war, but each of them with tremendous power, and each of them bound to take her place once more among the nations of the world. Germany, with her 65,000,000 people, still exists. Russia, with her 180,000,000 people, is still a part of the world. Combine German scientific knowledge, German intelligence, German workmanship, with the vast powers of Russia, her man power and her resources, and you have a force almost irresistible. Are you combining them? Every time you make combinations outside between three or four nations you drive those two nations together.

German schoolmasters are flocking into Russia by the thousands. German artisans and mechanics and German capitalists and German scientists are going there by the thousands. We conquered Germany. We overran Russia without the slightest cause. Three of the powers withdrew. Japan remains upon Russian soil. Will she be permitted to stay there forever? I venture the prediction that before 10 years have passed Russia, gathering again the strength of her sinews, will insist that her soil belongs to the white race, and that her people will make war to drive out the Japanese. When they do that they will find that one of their chief ports, Vladivostok, is menaced by an island one-half of which is in the possession of Japan; and when they move to eject the Japanese from that base they will have directly violated the terms of this treaty. We shall be bound to sit down and confer with Japan and Great Britain and France with reference to the question.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says there is no danger in that, because we have agreed to do nothing except to talk. I say that, in my judgment, the treaty will be construed to mean that we are to talk, we are to come to a conclusion, and we are to act upon that conclusion. I can find nothing in the language which will warrant any other deduction.

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power—

That means by war—

> the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

The action we are now speaking of is aggressive. That is war, and we are to confer with reference to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the war conditions. How do you meet war? By passing resolutions, or by passing shells out of the mouths of cannon? How do you meet war? By sitting around a table and talking it over, and at the end of the talk doing nothing? Is that what you are to consult about? Are "the most efficient measures to be taken" simply to pass a resolution or take a vote, or are you to do the obvious thing intended by this language, to meet force with force, arms with arms, ships with ships, men with men? Plainly, that is what is intended.

I do not care how many speeches may be made about this; 10 years from to-day, with Russian troops possibly driving the Japanese into the sea, with Russians crossing the narrow neck of the sea to the island of Sakhalin and there undertaking to eject the Japanese from that base, when we sit down at the council table to consult with reference to the most efficient measures to be taken to protect that island we will be laughed to scorn if we say, "We did not understand that we were to do anything except to sit down and talk about it, and when we have talked about the most efficient measures and found out what they were then we were not going to do anything at all, but just let it end in talk."

The construction is manifestly and plainly absurd, and I say that with all respect to the distinguished Senator who has spoken. Similar language has been found in other instruments, and has been given a construction that means war. I think I can find without much difficulty discussions in this body by many Senators to the effect that language almost identical with that which I have read, found in the Versailles treaty, was construed by them just as I construe this language, to be an obligation resting upon the parties to support each other by force of arms.

The astonishing thing about it all is that the country was told, "Here is a guaranty of the peace of the Pacific." Now Senators are told that we guarantee nothing; nobody agrees to do anything; and therefore we should accept this thing because it is absolutely innocuous, to wit, absolutely worthless.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, as I listened to the eloquent words of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], there came to my mind the words of Lincoln when he asked:

> Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world?

Mr. President, when the history of the last five years shall be written, the most astonishing truth about it all will be that while the statesmen of the world have blundered, the people have wondered. The statesmen of the world have not known how to make peace. They have been unable to see the obvious truths enunciated by the great Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], while the people of all the nations understand exactly where the difficulties lie, how they might be removed, and how a lasting peace might be secured.

Mr. President, I rise merely to say that I only wish that the consideration of these treaties might be long enough delayed to enable the people, in whose ultimate justice and in whose final judgments I have perfect confidence, to express themselves to the Senate of the United States. I rise to read into the RECORD the first returns from the State of Maryland; and in so doing I will say that many petitions and memorials from the people, with unperverted judgments, have been thrown by committees into scrap baskets or placed upon dusty files, when, if they had been read and considered, they might have resulted not only in the edification of the members of the committee but in their proper direction.

I am reading the resolutions adopted by a meeting of women at Easton, Md., on Sunday evening, March 5, 1922. It contains the whole argument against these treaties; and this petition proves that the women of Easton, Md., can see the results which would ultimately follow the adoption of this treaty, even if the statesmen at Washington can not:

> Whereas the Pacific compact, commonly known as the four-power pact, recently negotiated at the Washington conference and now before the United States Senate for consideration, omits from its signatory membership numerous nations having extensive actual and potential rights and interests in the regions of the Pacific Ocean and constituting in population about one-third of the entire human family; and
> Whereas exclusion of such nations from participation in such a pact or alliance will sooner or later lead to the formation of a counter-alliance to the end of securing a balance of world power and thus ultimately to war; and
> Whereas already two of such nations have notified the Department of State of the United States Government that they regard the negotiation of this pact as an act unfriendly to them: Therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That the mass meeting of citizens of Easton and Talbot County, Md., called by League of Women Voters and gathered here in Easton this 5th day of March, 1922, express to the two United States Senators from Maryland, to the leaders of the majority and the minority in the Senate, to the Secretary of State, and the President of the United States its disapproval of the Pacific treaty, or said four-power pact, in its present form, as containing the seeds of war rather than of peace, and its earnest hope that this alliance shall not be ratified unless so amended as to eliminate the seeds of war and thus insure the peace of the Pacific.
>
> Resolved further, That the United States Senators from Maryland be requested to have these resolutions printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.
> CAROLINE BURNITES WALKER,
> Chairman of the Meeting.
> (Mrs.) LINAS BRIDGES,
> Secretary of Meeting, Royal Oak, Md.
> Mrs. M. T. JOHNSTON.

I appeal to all patriotic citizens who look earnestly forward with the hope of world peace; I appeal to the congregations of churches, to the peace societies of the United States, to labor organizations, to all societies and associations who hope to see the reconciliation of all peoples and the establishment of a basis of permanent peace; I appeal to all these to read the words of this resolution and to pass resolutions of a similar character or to express in letters to their representatives in the United States Senate sentiments similar to those contained in this resolution. I feel that by immediately so doing they will subserve the interests of the people and that they will be rendering a valuable service not only to their own country but to the whole world.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 151).

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

> THE WHITE HOUSE,
> Washington, March 8, 1922.
> Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
> MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Agreeable to the request of the Senate, expressed in a resolution, concerning the passage of which I have just been informed, I am sending to you an opinion of the Attorney General relating to the eligibility of Senator SMOOT and Representative BURTON to serve on the World War Foreign Debt Commission.
>
> Very truly, yours,
>
> WARREN G. HARDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the message will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent that the communication just read, with the accompanying opinion of the Attorney General, be printed as a public document for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE LANSING-ISHII AGREEMENT (S. DOC. NO. 150).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read.

TO THE SENATE:

I have received the resolution (S. Res. 251) requesting me, if not incompatible with the public interest—to advise the Senate as to the present status and binding effect of what is known as the Lansing-Ishii agreement between the United States and the Empire of Japan.

Secondly, as to whether or not the four-power pact, now before the Senate for consideration, if ratified, will abrogate, nullify, or in any way modify such agreement, and as to what will be the status of said agreement after the ratification of said four-power pact.

The so-called Lansing-Ishii agreement, signed November 2, 1917, was not a treaty, but was an exchange of notes between the Secretary of State of the United States and Viscount Ishii, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of Japan on special mission. It was described in the notes themselves as a public announcement of the desires and intentions shared by the two Governments with regard to China. This exchange of notes, in the nature of things, did not constitute anything more than a declaration of executive policy. It is hardly necessary to point out that such a declaration, or exchange of notes, could not have any effect whatever inconsistent with treaty obligations whether existing or thereafter coming into force.

The statement in the notes in question which apparently called forth your resolution is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and, consequently, the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, and particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.

In the light of the other declarations of the notes in question, it has been the view of the Government of the United States that this reference to special interests in China did not recognize any right or claim inconsistent with the sovereignty or political independence of China or with our "open-door" policy.

That this was not an erroneous construction appears from the meaning ascribed to the phrase "special interests in China," which is found in the final statement made on behalf of Japan at the recent conference (S. Doc. No. 126, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 223). The phrase was interpreted to mean that propinquity gave rise to an interest differing only in degree, but not in kind, as compared with the interests of other powers. It was said to intimate "no claim or pretention of any kind prejudicial to China or to any other foreign nation," and not to connote "any intention of securing preferential or exclusive economic rights in China."

Happily, as a result of the conference, it is not now necessary to consider any possible ambiguity in the expressions used in the Lansing-Ishii agreement of 1917, as any question which they might have raised has been completely set at rest by the treaty now before the Senate, to which the United States and Japan are parties. I refer to the treaty between the nine powers which explicitly sets forth the principles and policies to be maintained by the signatory powers in relation to China.

It is thus agreed to respect the sovereignty, the independence and the territorial and administrative integrity of China; to provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government; to use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China; to refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to secure special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly States, and from countenancing action inimical to the security of such States.

More specifically the signatory powers agree that they will not seek, nor support their respective nationals in seeking, any arrangement which might purport to establish in favor of their interests any general superiority of rights with respect to commercial or economic development in any designated region of China, or any such monopoly or privilege as would deprive the nationals of any other power of the right of undertaking any legitimate trade or industry in China, or of participating with the Chinese Government or with any local authority, in any category of public enterprise, or which by reason of its scope, duration, or geographical extent is calculated to frustrate the practical application of the principle of equal opportunity.

And, further, the signatory powers agree not to support any agreements by their respective nationals with each other designed to create spheres of influence or to provide for the enjoyment of mutually exclusive opportunities in designated parts of Chinese territory.

The negotiation of this treaty is in itself the most formal declaration of the policy of the Executive in relation to China, and supersedes any Executive understanding or declaration that could possibly be asserted to have any contrary import. If the Senate assents to this treaty, the principles and policies which the treaty declares will be supported and enforced by a binding international agreement.

My answer, then, to your first question is that the so-called Lansing-Ishii agreement has no binding effect whatever, either with respect to the past or to the future, which is in any sense inconsistent with the principles and policies explicitly declared in the nine-power treaty to which I have referred.

As to your second question, I may say that the four-power treaty does not refer to China, and hence does not directly bear upon the Lansing-Ishii notes which related exclusively to China. The four-power treaty, however, is an essential part of the plan to create conditions in the Far East at once favorable to the policies we have long advocated and to an enduring peace.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 8, 1922.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the message of the President, the Lansing-Ishii agreement is supposed to be annulled or abrogated and henceforth to be disregarded, because it will be found to be in contravention to the terms of the nine-power treaty. That is not the view which some officials of Japan take of the nine-power treaty. I am very happy, however, to have the declaration of the Executive that that is the American view. This is an Executive agreement, as it were, and I presume, therefore, that the highest authority, and practically the sole authority, upon its continuance is the Executive, and I trust that the Japanese nation will understand that the Lansing-Ishii agreement is now at an end, provided the nine-power treaty is ratified.

I only desire to say, however, that after a very careful rereading of the nine-power treaty, I find nothing in it which conflicts with the Lansing-Ishii agreement, as that agreement was construed by the Japanese Government. Indeed, the Lansing-Ishii agreement contained within itself a specific declaration that the parties to the agreement would respect the territorial integrity of China. According to Mr. Lansing, it was for the purpose of reannouncing what is known as the Hay doctrine more specifically, and it was incorporated, therefore, in the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

The nine-power treaty is supposed to reannounce and to confirm more in detail the Hay doctrine of the open-door policy, but the Japanese Government always contended that the other provisions of the Lansing-Ishii agreement, which purported to give Japan a special interest in China, were not in conflict with the Hay doctrine and not in conflict with the agreement which they had made in regard to it, and I think the official statements of high officers of Japan are available now, and may be presented later, to the effect that the nine-power treaty is not in conflict with the special interests of Japan.

Only a short time ago one of the officials of Japan stated that Japan's interest in Manchuria was by reason of her special interest, her propinquity to China, reannouncing, as it were, the very doctrine which they claim was announced and conceded by the United States in the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

I rise to say, therefore, that, as I construe this message of the President, it is a renouncement of the Lansing-Ishii agreement—that is, provided the nine-power treaty is ratified—that he regards the nine-power treaty as in absolute conflict with the Lansing-Ishii understanding. That ought to terminate the Lansing-Ishii agreement. I trust it will be so understood and accepted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message will lie on the table and be printed.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, with reference to the four-power treaty I desire to say that I long ago favored a conference looking to the limitation of armament, and therefore welcomed the opportunity to hold the one just ended here. I have heretofore favored steps looking to cooperative efforts to secure peace and avoid misunderstandings and war. The word "alliance" has been misused. Every agreement among nations is not an "alliance." Even if it were, the alliance may be such as to promote peace rather than an alliance of a military character in contemplation of war. There can surely be no objection to such an alliance which would eliminate the probability of dispute and war.

I regard the four-power treaty as a part of the whole work of the conference, and its rejection would greatly minimize, if it did not destroy, the value of the other and closely related treaties.

To reject this treaty would to a very great extent defeat the sound policy which the country approves lying back of them all; that is, the reduction of armament, relief from excessive burdens which large army and navy establishments would impose, and the promotion of that relation among nations so essential to the world's economic recovery.

The agreement is to respect the rights of the parties concerned severally in relation to the islands of the Pacific. Why should we hesitate to agree to "respect the rights" of the British Empire, France, and Japan in the Pacific, or anywhere else, they each doing the same as to our rights?

If any controversy should arise out of any Pacific question involving such rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the agreement is to join in a conference for the consideration and adjustment thereby of such controversy.

If nations may not confer in case of any controversy or question, it would seem impossible to adjust any differences. It follows disputes would accumulate and war would be inevitable if we deny the propriety, the wisdom, or the possibility of nations holding a conference to adjust matters about which there may appear contrary views.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that if we do not ratify this treaty we can not sit down and confer about matters?

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume we could do it, but there is no agreement to do it and there is no practice of that kind in case of any question which is not adjusted by diplomatic negotiations.

Mr. REED. We always have done it, have we not?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no obligation to confer and no such conferences have been held.

Mr. REED. Is there not an obligation of that kind, in spirit substantially, that already exists with all of these countries?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no obligation to confer about controversies of the sort mentioned in this treaty. There were treaties negotiated in 1914 whereby controversies might be referred to an international commission, and that international commission was to have jurisdiction to determine those questions; but there is no treaty arrangement anywhere now whereby nations shall confer, where diplomatic action has failed, and even by the treaties of 1914 made between nations individually, some 28 treaties, between each of those countries and the United States, those treaties contemplated the reference of questions in dispute and requiring settlement to an international commission that might be constituted as provided in those treaties.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that from time immemorial all questions between our Government and other Governments have been taken up through regular diplomatic channels and discussed in a friendly way, and that that right exists to-day just as it has always existed?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely, and the pending treaty provides that if those questions can be settled by diplomatic negotiations that course will be followed, and that is the end of the matter. It is proposed to continue all those diplomatic activities that were possible before and as has been the practice heretofore. The proposed treaty does not interfere with that at all. It continues that practice, but if diplomatic efforts are ineffective and the controversy remains unsettled then the powers will be obligated to confer.

Article 2 provides in substance that if such rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power these parties to the treaty shall communicate with one another to determine the most efficient measure to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the situation.

There is no agreement to resort to force. The agreement is to hold council, to determine who is in the wrong, to let the world know the conclusions reached, the idea no doubt being that the public opinion of mankind would very likely exercise powerful weight to prevent war. There is no pledge or agreement or obligation to go to the assistance of any one of the parties. There is no contract to follow any conference by any act, much less any act behind which lies force. We make that clear in the resolution of ratification, in which we propose to expressly state that there shall be "no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense" on our part. That provision ought to satisfy the most sensitive on that point. I will support the treaty in spite of it rather than by reason of it. In each of the 28 treaties negotiated by the Secretary of State W. J. Bryan, and submitted by President Wilson, and ratified in 1914, there was a provision that the high contracting parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the commission shall have been submitted. This treaty is of the same general purport and character as those we ratified in 1914.

Under article 3 the treaty is to remain in force for 10 years.

The military alliance between Great Britain and Japan will be ended by this treaty. In its stead will be, not an alliance directed against any nation but an agreement between the four powers having rights and interests in the Pacific to respect one another's rights, and in case of any controversy to confer.

Without these treaties the situation in the Far East is one of more or less apprehension, suspicion, and fear. These elements do not usually improve, but lead to worse conditions. This treaty would remove the suspicion and the fear which often occasion force. It amounts to a mutual pledge for the respect of one another's rights, which it would seem we ought always to be willing to make.

It abolishes an alliance now highly objectionable and removes the causes which often develop a spirit of domination.

The vote against the treaty would be to help continue an alliance in which we have no part, whereas to ratify this treaty would be to do away with all alliances in the Far East.

We surely do not wish to have Great Britain and Japan continue their military partnership, we surely ought to be willing to respect the rights of others, we ought not to decline to confer with any nation in case of any dispute not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, we should desire to remove all causes for possible trouble in the Pacific, and feel, regarding all our possessions and rights in that region, that all our neighbors respect our rights, as we do theirs, and will not interfere with them.

I would like it better if all the nations of the world were parties to the agreement, as might have been the case if we had ratified the Versailles treaty. But having been driven from that by the overworked "entangling alliance" false alarms, this appears to me the next best thing in the same direction of promoting peace in the world, doing away with competitive armament, and removing, to a great extent, the excuses and probabilities of war.

I would have no objection if some provision could be made, although I would hesitate to undertake to amend this treaty, whereby other States might be admitted to such conferences as may arise or be called pursuant to this treaty, on an equal footing with the powers which are parties to the treaty, in case of any controversy involving such nonmember States. That would not be objectionable to me, although I would not jeopardize this treaty if that would be the result of such an amendment. It would include China and Russia, if they were invited in, and that might possibly alleviate some difficulties that might arise in the future. I can see no reasonable objection to the ratification of this treaty, and I believe the possibilities are very great for advantages to all concerned and to world order flowing from it. It is so related to the other treaties coming out of the conference, particularly the one respecting the reduction of armaments, that I feel it should be regarded as a part of the whole work and should be ratified.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Oh, Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. HARRISON. The point has been made now, and I can not withdraw it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained at a hearing of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] argued that we would get rid of the menace of the Anglo-Japanese treaty if we ratified the pending treaty. He also argued that we could not defeat this treaty without endangering the other treaties. He further argued that there was no contract in this treaty. None of those contentions, in my judgment, is well founded.

For months and months the representatives of the great nations sat here in Washington, and, so far as the pending treaty is concerned, they sat in secret. Not a word came from the council room to the outside world. Senators who are asked to vote to ratify this compact are told virtually nothing of the approaches by which it was reached. The language of the document seems to me to make a contract. The purpose is "the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance" of the rights of these nations. Having that in view, these nations make a treaty. In Section II we bind ourselves, in honor and in law, to meet in further conference with the other three nations and to agree upon methods by which they may defend themselves, in the maintenance of those rights which are specified in the preamble of the treaty. We should have no option if called upon to go into that conference. We are, in honor and in law, bound to adopt methods to defend the rights of Japan, of Great Britain, and of France. If we should hesitate our sense of honor would be appealed to, war propaganda would again take possession of the country, and the Senate and House of Representatives would be compelled to keep the plighted faith of this Republic. I do not see how any Senator can escape that conclusion. It is a contract; it is a treaty in the truest sense. It forms a quadruple alliance.

The Senator from Florida further said we could not defeat this treaty without endangering the others. That does not follow. The treaties come here separately; they are debated separately; and they are ratified or rejected separately. Each one stands upon its own merits.

Is the Anglo-Japanese treaty a menace to us? If so, the two nations which are bound by it are already our enemies. How can anybody escape that conclusion? If, as the Senator from Florida says, that alliance is a menace which endangers our future, then the hearts from which it sprang can not be friendly to America and to American interests. If Great Britain is our friend, either in the Atlantic or the Pacific, she should not have endangered us by going into such an alliance. If Japan is our friend, she should not have endangered us by this compact, this military alliance, as the Senator from Florida calls it.

The Senator from Florida refers to the resolution of ratification as safeguarding us from the necessity of ever taking up arms for one of these allies. Whom does that reservation bind? When and where did Japan, Great Britain, or France agree that the contract could be changed, after they had signed it? The proposed change is a novation of contract, and it would not stand in morals or in law for one moment.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], especially toward the conclusion of his speech, during which he spoke a long time and revealed nothing of the secret workings of that conference, spoke in language that Woodrow Wilson might have used when he appeared before Congress and asked for the ratification of the covenant of the League of Nations. The Senator from Massachusetts, in going into this fight, borrowed the plumes of Woodrow Wilson and wore them in the battle. The Senator from Massachusetts says that dark clouds are on the horizon and the only way to dispel them is to ratify this treaty and go into the quadruple alliance. Where are the clouds? What are the dangers? Does the Senator mean to be understood as saying that Great Britain has designs against us, or that Japan has, or that France has? As usual, the Senator retires when questions are asked that he can not answer. He has borrowed from Woodrow Wilson, but the loan is so recent that he does not wear very gracefully the plumage which he has appropriated to himself.

"Let us not blight the hope of the world," says the Senator from Massachusetts. That reminds me of what President Wilson stated to Congress when he said if they rejected the League of Nations it would "break the heart of the world." The thoughts are the same. Here are two hearts that beat as one, at last. [Laughter.]

Whoever thought that the Senator from Massachusetts, who achieved fame throughout the world by his great campaign against the League of Nations, would now be clothing his thoughts in the classic verbiage of Woodrow Wilson?

Break the heart of the world! Will we break the heart of Germany if we do not go into this alliance with France? Will not the German heart rather be broken if we do? We will not break Germany's heart by staying out of an alliance with France. By staying out of an alliance with Japan we will not break the Russian heart, whose wounds are now bleeding from the cruel blows of Japan. We could not do a more popular thing in Germany and Russia, both of which nations are going to come back and come back strong, than by staying away from the Orient and refusing to ratify this treaty.

Mr. President, Senators sometimes reverse their policies and change their minds, but I think this morning was the first time when I have seen a Senator on one day forget the speech he had made on a preceding day. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] did that very thing. He said, if I should do him the honor of reading his speech, I would see so and so. Well, I did read his speech, and that is the reason I know he had forgotten it. Here is his speech, on page 3408 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 6 of this year. In that speech again and again he calls the four-power treaty an association of nations. To be effective, an association must be as strong as a league, and an effective league would be equivalent to an effective association; they are interchangeable terms.

The Senator from Indiana went further. He referred at length to the grand design of Henry IV, but he said that that was defective because it was not founded upon the grand principles which are the base of this association of nations. He went from the grand design to the Holy Alliance, and was comparing in his mind throughout this quadruple alliance with the quadruple alliance of a hundred years ago. I am almost tempted to read some of the beautiful language in the Senator's speech:

> Because the alternative to life under free, common understanding, with mutual trust and forbearance, in an association of recognized, unrestrained peers is domination by one or by few under such a rule of brute force as will plunge the world into chaos and threaten humanity with oblivion. No; we may not cast aside these treaties as mere idle words under penalty of being overwhelmed by the outburst of righteous condemnation from all the peoples of the world.

Will China overflow with joy if we refuse to ratify this treaty? Will Siberia chant hallelujahs if we refuse to ratify this treaty? Talk about rejoicing if this treaty is ratified. Will the 7,000,000 majority who voted for Harding and Coolidge in November, 1920, rejoice? They went millions strong to vote down a League of Nations which they understood to compromise their independence. Who dreamed then that the Republicans would so soon forget the lessons of that election and would be going into a quadruple alliance which binds us to defend the right of Japan in the Pacific?

Have you referred this question to the people? Have they had an opportunity to be heard? Have we the authority to bind them in a matter like this that changes the policy of a hundred years?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I have not heard all of the Senator's argument. I heard a portion of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. As I understood the position of the Senator from Massachusetts, the treaty now before us is innocuous. It does not bind us to do anything except to sit down at a table and talk over any possible controversy. As I understood his position, if Japan should be the aggressor, and that aggression should constitute an overt act, an act of war, then the treaty forbids even consultation, because consultation could exist only if war were nebulous or if there were a controversy which had not resulted in any overt act. If that is the interpretation which the Senator places upon the pact, obviously it is somewhat different from the interpretation placed upon it by the Senator from Georgia, who has just now said that it is a quadruple alliance which binds the United States to come to the aid of Japan in the Pacific. I should like the Senator to explain what he thinks the treaty is, and wherein the Senator from Massachusetts has wrongly interpreted it, from the Senator's point of view.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, when this treaty was first mentioned some months ago, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said that it would add to our security on the Pacific slope, and I asked him then if he believed that Japan would give up the Anglo-Japanese treaty and accept this if she did not consider this better than that. That question remains unanswered. In fact, it answers itself; but the very language of this treaty binds us to future conference and binds us to adopt the measures that are necessary to protect the rights of Japan or of France or of England. How on earth any other construction can be put on it, except that we do bind ourselves to attend a future conference and to adopt those means which will most effectively accomplish the purpose of protecting the rights of these nations in the Orient, I do not understand.

Mr. President, China deserves the sympathy of humanity throughout the world. It is a country where, even in the old times, when a stranger was looked upon as an enemy in every country of Europe, China was so pacific in her nature, so kind in her treatment of the stranger, that travelers from Europe could go from one part of the Empire to the other and everywhere they received hospitality and kindness. It is the only country of which that can be said, and it can be said of her with absolute truth. She became our ally during the Great War. She sent laborers to France who did the heavy manual labor which otherwise would have taken French soldiers from the ranks, where they were so much needed. Time and again these Chinese coolies fed our soldier boys when those soldier boys were starving and needed the food. Instance after instance has been given this country. She came with actual help. She proposed even to send troops.

What did Japan do? She did nothing except for Japan, and in the future she will be found pursuing the same course. She is for Japan. Not a soldier, not a marine, not a ship in action, did she put in European waters. Her activities were confined strictly to seizing those territories which the Germans had seized, and to holding them after she got them. Not one loan, not one vessel full of provisions, no material aid whatever, did Japan give to us or to France or to England during the terrible ordeal when victory hung in the balance.

Now, Mr. President, we are asked by this quadruple alliance to ratify what Japan did, to condone her crimes against Korea, Siberia, and China. Who knows what we are getting into? There are hundreds of those islands down there, and not one European in a million knows a thing about them.

We loaned England, in round numbers, five thousand million dollars. She owes us now as interest something like $500,000,000. She will not pay us. She paid her soldiers a bonus in part out of our money, while our soldiers go destitute and despairing without a bonus. She compelled us to pay her for the old cattle ships which transported our boys, crowded like sardines, to her relief, going to her salvation, asking no reward for their services or their sacrifices. We actually paid her here, since I have been serving, $46,000,000, the last installment on the freightage of our troops, and even then she was refusing to pay a cent of interest, and was starting a propaganda that looked as if they wanted the debts canceled. I believe they do want them canceled, and I am very much afraid that is what will be the result of these final refunding negotiations.

Mr. President, partly with our money Great Britain has dammed the blue Nile in the Soudan, and will soon have 3,000,000 acres of the best cotton land in the world to compete with ours. The soil will need no fertilizer. It will not depend upon the skies for the moisture to develop the crop. It never will be too hot nor too cold for her young cotton plants. No boll weevil will devastate her cotton belt, and on 3,000,000 acres she will raise sufficient cotton for all her mills and a large part of what the German mills consume. Therefore, in part, with our money she is building up a competition that may mean destruction to the great industry, the only money crop, of the South. In like manner she is using in part our money to develop the wheat fields of Mesopotamia, the fields which, under proper irrigation, used to give bread to the whole eastern world. That area is now coming into cultivation again, and under the irrigation system the yield will be two or three times as much as the best wheat fields of the West can produce. Therefore, with our money she is building up competition, ruinous rivalry, to our two great staples, wheat and cotton.

We are asked to go into a binding contract with her which would enormously increase the difficulties of handling that debt proposition; and, as to Japan, it will add enormously to the difficulties of handling the Japanese question on the Pacific coast. The time will soon come, if this treaty be ratified, when we will hear it said that California ought to yield to the common interest of the Union, and not give Japan a just cause of quarrel in reference to the State laws, the citizenship laws, of California.

Mr. President, from every possible point of view this treaty is dangerous, and I hope it will not be rushed through here until we can hear from our constituents. If the people learn what this treaty really means, and how it revolutionizes the traditional policy of our Government, I believe there will be a protest against it, from Maine to California, and from Michigan to Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to agree to the reservation reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harris	Newberry	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harrison	Nicholson	Shields
Broussard	Heflin	Norris	Smith
Bursum	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Spencer
Cameron	Kellogg	Overman	Sterling

Hale	Nelson	Reed
Harreld	New	Robinson

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is necessarily absent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are in attendance on a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] alike dwelt upon the fact that this proposed treaty permits nations to get together and talk their differences over. One would have naturally inferred from their statements, although they did not say so in direct terms, that the proposed treaty is the first suggestion which has ever been made that in case of dispute between this and other countries there may be a conference or talk before we go to fighting, and that this treaty we are now making with reference to the islands in the Pacific is the first real suggestion we have ever had that we shall keep the peace each with the other.

It might be interesting in that behalf to call attention to the fact that so long ago as 1800 we made a treaty with France, the first article of which provided:

> There shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship between the French Republic and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, without exception of person or places.

That would seem to be at least a convention of peace. Then in 1908 we made a treaty with France, which reads in part as follows:

> ARTICLE I.
>
> Differences which may arise of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States and do not concern the interests of third parties.
> ARTICLE II.
> In each individual case the high contracting parties, before appealing to the permanent court of arbitration, shall conclude a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute, the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, and the periods to be fixed for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure.

That would seem to have afforded a time to talk things over and to give a chance for peaceful adjustment, and for a decision upon the matters in dispute by a tribunal as nearly impartial as has yet been devised.

In that connection it is proper to call attention to the fact that we have had a treaty with Japan since 1854 which recites that there shall be a perfect, permanent, and universal peace and a sincere, cordial amity between the United States of America on the one part, the Empire of Japan on the other part, and between their people, respectively, without exception of persons or places.

We have other treaties with both these powers relating to navigation, the rights of ships, and the rights of nationals, guaranteeing rights of religious worship, and so forth.

We have a treaty with Great Britain containing clauses similar to the first article of the treaty with Japan and the treaty with France. In 1911 we made a treaty which recites, among other things:

> The United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being equally desirous of perpetuating the peace, which has happily existed between the two nations, as established in 1814 by the treaty of Ghent, and has never since been interrupted by an appeal to arms, and which has been confirmed and strengthened in recent years by a number of treaties whereby pending controversies have been adjusted by agreement or settled by arbitration or otherwise provided for; so that now for the first time there are no important questions of difference outstanding between them, and being resolved that no future differences shall be a cause of hostilities between them or interrupt their good relations and friendship;

The high contracting parties have, therefore, determined in furtherance of these ends to conclude a treaty extending the scope and obligations of the policy of arbitration adopted in their present arbitration treaty of April 4, 1908, so as to exclude certain exceptions contained in that treaty—

And so forth.

Article 1 provides that—

All differences hereafter arising between the high contracting parties which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy relating to international matters in which the high contracting parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other arbitral tribunal, as shall [may] be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, define the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference and the procedure thereunder.

Then follow the clauses providing for the creation of the arbitral commission and the procedure to be followed.

We have a similar treaty of arbitration with France, so that with the three powers which are parties to this treaty with us we have treaties of peace of the most solemn character which contemplate the settlement of our disputes through ordinary diplomatic channels, and if the diplomats can not agree it is then solemnly recited that the matter in dispute shall be submitted to arbitration or to the Hague tribunal.

Therefore, we have not only all that this treaty gives us if the construction now placed upon it be correct but we have something better. We have an arbitration provided for, all of which contemplates consulting, talking matters over in a diplomatic way, and then submitting the question for decision, if a decision can not be agreed on by mutual consent, to a properly organized arbitration tribunal. The Bryan treaties, so called, which have been made with a large number of countries, contain largely the same provisions for settlement and provide for what we might call in law a stay of execution or rather for a period during which matters of negotiation can be carried on.

If, therefore, we take the view which has been expressed with reference to the four-power alliance, that this is in fact no alliance, that we have agreed to do nothing except sit around and talk, and that as a result of the talk we are not to be bound morally or legally to anything that may be agreed upon, then we are substituting for the treaties now existing a rule not nearly so effective, not nearly so clear, and not nearly so likely to avoid differences and difficulties in the future.

The construction placed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] upon this treaty is that we are perfectly safe to go into it because it does not bind anybody to do anything. It is a rope of sand that vanishes at touch. It does not draw a single pound. It accomplishes nothing.

It is an agreement that we will sit down and talk matters over, which has always been our right and has always been the right of every nation. If that is all there is to this treaty why is it, when the construction was placed upon it that it included all of Japan, that it was found necessary to make a subsequent or supplemental treaty excluding what we will call the mainland of Japan? Why should we object or why should any nation object to sitting down and talking about our mainland as well as our islands, if as the result of the talk nothing was to be done and nobody was to be bound?

Why not include the whole world in it? Why not in fact have every nation of kindred people and tongue come into a general gabfest with reference to everything? No harm could come of it. When a treaty is drawn that implies nothing more than a tea party, at which everybody is privileged to say what he pleases and then get up and go away—if that is the true construction of this treaty—why should they have excepted from its terms all of Japan except certain particular islands that are named? Why should they have carefully included in the number of islands named that are to be included within the treaty that particular island which is bound to be the scene of a bloody conflict between Russia and Japan within the next few years? I said "bound to be." No one can look into the future with certainty, but the conditions and circumstances are of the most menacing character.

The trouble with the argument that has been advanced is that it leaves the proponents of the treaty in the position that they have met and done nothing. The argument contends that the mountain has not even brought forth a mouse capable of nibbling at a bit of cheese, that the army marched up the hill and marched down again without leaving any tracks in the mud, that the result of all the conference is that we have agreed, in case there is any dispute between ourselves and our new allies, that we will talk it over, and then we will do just as we please after we have talked it over. If any other nation proposes to come in and attack, we will meet and solemnly determine on the best means of repelling that attack, and then we will all take our hats and go home, and nobody will be bound to do anything, morally, legally, or any other way. There will not be the slighest obligation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator from Massachusetts correctly, whenever there is an overt act, whether upon the part of either of the signatories to the treaty or upon the part of some other power, then the treaty ceases to function at all, and we are not obligated to meet.

Mr. REED. Yes; it then becomes something less than nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The conference which negotiated this treaty adopted two declarations in the nature of reservations to the treaty itself, and in one of those declarations it expressly reserves, by the provisions of the treaty, all domestic questions. If the effect of the treaty is merely to arrange for a conference, what would be the objection to conferring about domestic controversies which are likely to occasion conflict between the nations parties to the dispute?

We all know that the only matters of controversy which may disturb the condition of harmony existing between the United States and Japan are domestic questions, namely, the immigration of Japanese to the United States, racial equality in some vague form, and the claim of the Japanese to a right to own land in California. Why should we except these controversies from conference if there is nothing binding in the conference, but it is merely an attempt to reach a harmonious agreement?

Mr. REED. Certainly that is true. Why except a matter from the subject of conversation if nothing is to be done and if nobody is to be bound? The construction is absurd. It leaves the treaty absurd. I will not say the construction is absurd, but either the treaty is absurd or the construction is absurd. We are to talk things over and be bound by nothing. We are not to make a contract to do anything except that we will talk. It reminds me of the incident in the somewhat ancient story of the young man who asked the young lady if she would marry him. She replied indignantly "I would not think of marrying a fellow like you." He said, "Don't get mad about it. I did not want to marry you. I just asked for information." There was not to be any contract; he merely wanted to get the state of her mind. That is all we are to do by these conferences.

But we can have such conferences to-morrow with any nation, and we do have them regularly. Almost daily matters are coming up between our State Department and the foreign offices of other nations. Communications take place and matters are settled. It may be nothing more than the right of one of their nationals to land in the United States, or the right of one of our nationals to visit in their country, or the right of somebody who has lost his baggage over there, or it may involve more serious questions. They are talked over constantly. It is for that reason that great legations are maintained at enormous expense in Washington, and that we maintain legations in the capitals of every first-class nation on the earth.

The whole truth is that this was intended to be an alliance so powerful and so potential that the nations could rely upon it as a matter of defense against the outside world, or attack, if you please, and could afford, because of a mutual obligation of defense and assistance, to cut down their navies.

We are told that we could not have disarmament without having the four-power treaty. Why? Because the power of the four-power treaty was to take the place of the power of the navies and armies of these countries. We were to abrogate them and consolidate them and put them in a position where they would operate together, and with such an arrangement as that we could all afford to cut down our armament. Now, that argument having been put forth, we are told that this treaty is not a treaty of alliance, not a treaty of mutual support and help, not a treaty wherein the majority of nations will compel an offending member to obey the terms of the treaty, but it is a mere sounding of brass and tinkling of cymbals, a thing not even of shreds and patches, a mere false pretense, a mere piece of international buncombe by which the nations agree solemnly that they will sit down and talk matters over and be bound by nothing that takes place.

Mr. LODGE. Why does the Senator carefully avoid saying that it terminates the Anglo-Japanese alliance?

Mr. REED. I have already discussed that.

Mr. LODGE. That is definite enough.

Mr. REED. The Senator went out of the Chamber about the time I reached that in my discussion. It will all appear in the RECORD. I said then and I say now that if Japan and England, under any paper treaty that has ever been written, would unite in an attack on the United States, then especially Great Britain is a country so numbed of all sense of decency and of all the sacredness of obligations that nothing would bind her. I said then and I say now that if the blood we spilled has not created a bond between Great Britain and the United States more lasting and more sacred than any we can ever have placed upon parchment by pen and ink, then we can put no reliance in the parchment words of Great Britain.

What is an obligation? Is it only to be expressed upon a piece of paper? Is that all we can rely upon? If so, then our reliance is based upon a shadow. The thing that makes an obligation sacred is the honor of a nation. If a nation rescued from certain defeat by the prowess of American soldiers, saved from bankruptcy by dollars from the American Treasury, enriched with a territory greater than that controlled by Rome in the proudest days of the Cæsars, would turn upon her friend and benefactor, would repudiate the blood obligation, would make war against the very soldiers who had protected her—if a nation will do that, then her signature to a document amounts to nothing. If she would repudiate this obligation, established before High Heaven and recorded by God Almighty Himself in His memoirs of man, then there is no use in asking her to sign a piece of paper agreeing to discontinue her alliance with Japan.

Are there no obligations that nations will observe except those written with a pen? What becomes of all the fine phrases of "Hands Across the Sea"? What becomes of the doctrine that "we both speak the same language and are natural allies"? What becomes of the claim that "we are the two leading Christian nations marching along parallel lines to the heights of civilization and glory"? Is that all idle talk? If it be idle talk, then will not this be an idle piece of paper? But if you give to the piece of paper all the virtue you ascribe to it, it is merely that we will remain on friendly terms; it is merely that we will not impinge upon each other's rights; and that is already provided in treaties solemnly set down.

In considering the method of treatment of this particular document, as compared to that accorded the Versailles treaty, I am afraid that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] takes a little different view of something which emanates from the White House to-day and something which came from the White House about three years ago.

Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who want to speak on this treaty. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts to try to get a vote on it to-day?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not expect to get a vote on the treaty to-day, but I am desirous of proceeding with the debate as long as possible this afternoon. I think it is not unreasonable to ask that the treaty shall be debated and voted on at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. REED. So far as I am concerned, I expect really to discuss the treaty one of these days pretty soon, but I am not prepared to do so now.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I think we might go ahead and deal with the articles of the treaty.

Mr. REED. If we are to vote on the articles, we might as well vote on the treaty, for there are only four articles.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to hurry any Senators, but I think it is not unreasonable, after a week's time has been given, to ask that the debate shall go forward.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has heretofore brought before the Senate a bill of importance and is probably now ready to discuss it. It seems that there is no Senator who cares to go on with the discussion of the treaty this afternoon. I myself expect to submit some remarks on the treaty, but I should prefer not to do so this afternoon. I suggest, if the Senator from Massachusetts is not ready to have the Senate adjourn, that the Senator from Iowa be permitted to take up what is known as the judiciary bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is my desire to get these treaties out of the way in order to clear the path for the bill of the Senator from Iowa, the appropriation bills, and the tariff bill, but I shall not be able to do so if the treaties are put over day after day and day after day and debate is permitted to drag. All I ask is debate. I do not expect a vote on the treaty now.

Mr. ROBINSON. So far as I am advised—and I think I am pretty well informed respecting the situation—there is no disposition among Senators unduly to prolong the debate. It is the desire of all Senators that within a reasonable time the debate shall be brought to an end and that the treaty be disposed of. We have to-day been proceeding for some hours; it is rather late to begin my speech; I could not conclude this afternoon; and I should, therefore, prefer not to go on now.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to press the Senator from Arkansas to go on this afternoon if he does not desire to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Massachusetts insists upon it, however, I shall have to do so.

Mr. LODGE. But I thought we ought to try to continue the debate on the treaty and devote the days to it steadily or else fix a day when a vote on it may be taken.

Mr. ROBINSON. In connection with that suggestion, I wish to point out the fact that on yesterday, before any advocate of the treaty had discussed it, the Senator from Massachusetts announced that unless some Senator was ready to take the floor to-day he would insist upon a vote on the treaty. Subsequently, however, he announced that he himself would discuss it, and to-day he has delivered an address respecting the subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to say that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] spoke at length upon the treaty on Monday; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] spoke at length on Tuesday; therefore there have already been three speeches made in behalf of the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. But there have been an equal number of speeches made to-day in what may be termed opposition to the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I am aware of that, but I want all of the speeches on both sides to be made as soon as possible; that is all. I think that is not unreasonable. I am glad that the Senator from Arkansas thinks there is no disposition unduly to delay the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am sure there is not; and I am sure that the Senator from Massachusetts will accomplish nothing by attempting to press the debate at this time. I think it is only reasonable that the Senate be afforded an opportunity to consider the subject with some degree of deliberation. If there were the slightest disposition to conduct what is commonly called a filibuster, I should not make the statement that I now make, but there is no such disposition.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure there is not.

Mr. ROBINSON. The treaty should not be disposed of immediately.

Mr. LODGE. I do not expect to vote to-day; I want to give all reasonable time for debate; but I know from long experience in the Senate that if but one speech is made on the subject in a day, and then the Senate proceeds with something else, the treaty will drag on for a long time. I do not want these treaties to drag on; I want to get a vote. I do not desire to inconvenience Senators, and if they will name some reasonable day when we may agree to take a vote I shall be content.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would not be possible at this time, I am sure, to fix a day for a vote, although that may be done later on.

Mr. LODGE. Then, of course, the Senator must see that, being in charge of the treaty and being anxious to get results, I have no choice except to keep Senators here and press the treaty for consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the Senator recalls that there was another treaty a year or two ago which was before the Senate for many months, and it was chiefly through his instrumentality and his leadership that it was kept here for that length of time. I repeat the statement that there is no disposition, certainly not on this side of the Chamber, to protract the debate unduly; but it is now approximately 4.30 o'clock, within 30 minutes of the time when the Senate usually adjourns, and if the Senator is unwilling to adopt some other course of procedure, I shall ask that the Senate adjourn or recess, although I prefer not to do that.

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean, in any event, to keep the Senate here after 5 o'clock on this question, and I am perfectly willing that the Senate take a recess now, but——

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the Senator ask that that be done.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done, unless the Senator from Iowa cares to go on for a time with the bill which he has in charge. I do want to give notice, however, that I feel I have no choice, and that I must ask that the Senate either agree to a day to vote or else proceed with the debate on the treaty. I think that is not an unreasonable request.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senate has been debating this subject with fair diligence.

Mr. LODGE. It has to-day; yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Since the treaty has been before the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts himself has not discussed it until during the present day.

Mr. LODGE. That is so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, I hardly think that, with his experience and training in these matters, he would expect the Senate to take a vote on so important a question until the chief proponents of the treaty have discussed it and given others an opportunity to reflect upon their judgment.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is only proper that there should be a reasonable time allowed Senators who desire to speak; but, as I look at it, I have no choice, except to press the treaty for discussion or for a vote; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I may say, for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, that I am very anxious to secure consideration for the bill to which reference has been made; but I think it would serve no useful purpose to bring it up at this hour in the afternoon. I, at least, want enough time to explain the bill continuously, and not to be interrupted by a recess or an adjournment. That I could not promise to do by 5 o'clock. Therefore it seems to me wise not to bring it up at this time.

Mr. LODGE. There is no necessity of adjourning at 5 o'clock, if the Senator desires to go on with the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts suggested that we would not continue the session after 5 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I stated what my intention had been. I should be very glad, however, to continue, so far as I am concerned, until the Senator has had time to present and explain his bill. We make rather short hours in the Senate now.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it would not be wise to proceed now with the consideration of the bill of which the Senator from Iowa is in charge. There is going to be considerable debate upon that bill; there will have to be a quorum called. It is now half-past 4 o'clock, and I suggest that we should not proceed with that bill at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to take it up if I can have any assurance that the Senate will remain in session for an hour or an hour and a quarter.

Mr. LODGE. I think that that assurance ought to be given. I am ready to give that assurance, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest, with regard to the four-power treaty, that whatever opposition there is to the various treaties for the most part surrounds this particular treaty, in which there are some important questions involved. I am one of those who expect to support that treaty on the final vote, and I think we have been making reasonable progress thus far. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I understand, intends to address the Senate upon the subject, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just indicated his intention so to do, and there are some other Senators who perhaps will speak. I do not think it can be said that we have not been making reasonable progress; and I hope that at this particular time an effort will not be made to fix an hour for a vote. I do not believe anything will be gained by it.

Mr. LODGE. I shall not attempt it at this time. On the contrary, I am perfectly willing to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, before the conclusion of this debate I shall make some observations myself with regard to the treaty. I am not prepared to do it now, but I am sure there will be no delay from anything I say. Of course, the argument I shall make against the ratification of the treaty is simply the argument that I presented against the covenant of the League of Nations some two years ago. There is so little difference that I think it will fit this case, and I certainly shall not cause any delay.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think probably it would be wiser not to proceed with the so-called judges' bill this afternoon. It will be necessary to secure a quorum, because many Senators who are interested in the bill are not present.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we take a recess or adjourn, whichever he prefers.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to ask for an executive session with closed doors.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would the Senator object to going into legislative session and permitting me to call up for consideration the resolution that I asked to have considered yesterday in regard to the furnishing of certain information by the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. LODGE. No; I have no objection to going into legislative session for that purpose.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed its legislative session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The bill was read twice by its title.

ATTORNEYS EMPLOYED BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution submitted by me on yesterday. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read Senate resolution 253, submitted by Mr. KING on the 7th instant, as follows:

Whereas the Senate on January 5, 1922, passed a certain resolution requiring the Alien Property Custodian to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian, together with certain other information specified in said resolution; and

Whereas the Alien Property Custodian has failed and neglected to respond to said resolution, although ample time has intervened since the passing of the same for him to report to the Senate the information requested: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian be, and he is hereby, directed to forthwith report to the Senate the information requested of him in said resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, out of consideration for the Alien Property Custodian, as I have not heard his excuse, I ask that the words "and neglected" be stricken out, so that it will read "has failed." I do not want to pass judgment in advance, but will rest the matter entirely upon the failure of the custodian to furnish the information required.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, upon yesterday the Senator from Utah introduced this resolution, which, in mandatory fashion, directs the Alien Property Custodian immediately to comply with Senate resolution No. 191, introduced by the Senator from Utah on January 5 last, the implication, of course, being that the Alien Property Custodian has been negligent in failing to comply with the request of the Senate for this information. I think when the Senate realizes what the resolution of the Senator from Utah required the Alien Property Custodian to do, it will understand why that officer has been utterly unable to comply with the request prior to this time.

I have before me a copy of the original resolution. The Alien Property Custodian is required to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian and their compensation; the names of all attorneys, directors, supervisors, managers, auditors, or other agents appointed by the Alien Property Custodian to take care of or to have the administration of property, with the compensation paid to each; the names of all attorneys appointed or employed by corporations, agents, or individuals who have been or are acting as administrators or caretakers of property, and the compensation paid to each; the names of all attorneys who have represented or who now represent claimants to property under the control of the Custodian; the names of all attorneys who have represented claimants to whom property has been returned and the compensation allowed each of them; and a statement and description of all property sold by the Alien Property Custodian, with the names of the corporations or persons to whom sold and the amount received therefor.

Mr. President, I am informed from the Alien Property Custodian's office that ever since the receipt of this request from the Senate a force of clerks in that office of varying size has been steadily at work. The task of complying with this request is not yet finished; but up to date, let me say for the information of the Senate, the report comprises 3,500 typewritten pages, and it is not finished yet.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The law, as the Senator knows, requires the Alien Property Custodian to submit on the 1st of January of each year a full and detailed statement of all of his proceedings under the trading with the enemy act. I am advised that for the present year no report has been filed. Indeed, only one report has been filed since the appointment of an Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator looked up the law?

Mr. KING. I have read the law to which I refer, requiring the filing of a report by the President on the 1st day of January of each year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not a fact that the Alien Property Custodian makes the report upon the request of the President?

Mr. KING. The President of the United States is directed to file the report on the 1st of January of each year; and I presume, of course, that the Alien Property Custodian is the one who will make the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator will find that no such report as the one which he now requires is contemplated, or could have been contemplated.

Mr. KING. Of course, I differ from the Senator as to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have sample pages of the report which the Senator insists upon. It is going to cost hundreds and hundreds of dollars to print it as a Senate document, in addition to the expense required by the clerical force, which has been working on it up to date every day. It now consists of 3,500 pages, and the end is not in sight.

When a resolution goes up to the Alien Property Custodian which asks him for a statement and description of all property sold by the Alien Property Custodian, with the names of the corporations or persons to whom sold, and the amount received therefor, we had better understand what we are asking for. There are properties sold here for as small a sum as $1; others for $1.25, for $2, for $4—tiny, little, trifling sums. Every one of them has to be hunted up, the name of the person to whom sold, and the amount. There are 8,000 attorneys under one category, I am told by the Alien Property Custodian; that is, the attorneys who have represented claimants to whom property has been returned. Ten different branches of work have to be investigated in order to get all this information together. Ten groups of employees at one time or another have to cooperate in getting it all together.

I am quite certain that neither the Senator from Utah nor the Senate itself understood that it was imposing such a terrific task upon the Alien Property Custodian.

I am not moving to rescind, if it were possible in a parliamentary sense to do so, the original resolution, but I do protest against the adoption of this resolution, which implies that the Alien Property Custodian has been negligent. He has not been negligent. We have burdened him with an amount of work which his office is utterly unfitted to undertake, especially as that office has been cut down to a considerable degree, due to the reduction in appropriations, from the personnel as it existed prior to the advent into office of the present custodian. Instead of 175 clerks, which was the number in the office a year ago, there are to-day 130. Instead of an appropriation of $455,000, it has to-day an appropriation of $375,000. If the Congress is going to impose these burdens on these officers in compiling a report which will weigh pounds and pounds—it will be difficult for a man to carry it in here—we shall have to be a little patient with them and display some confidence in their loyalty to the Government and some understanding of the difficulty of the task that we have imposed upon them.

Mr. President, I therefore move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the law which was passed by Congress created the office of Alien Property Custodian. Under that law Mr. Palmer was appointed. Subsequently, when he went into the Cabinet, Mr. Garvan was appointed, and later the present occupant of the office, Mr. Miller, was appointed. The law requires that there shall be submitted by the President to Congress on the 1st of January of each succeeding year a full and complete report of the proceedings under the law. If the information called for by this resolution is not available, it exhibits the fact that the office has not kept suitable records and suitable books.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, has anybody said that the information is not available? Every bit of it is available.

Mr. KING. I am not so sure what the implication is that others might have drawn from the remarks of the Senator, but I drew from his remarks the inference that much of that information was not available.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not see how the Senator could. I merely said that this was a tremendous task, which they had not finished.

Mr. KING. I submit that if the books of the department had been kept in a proper way—and perhaps they have been kept in a proper way—the information, or much of it, could have been collated and put into proper form in a very short time. I think all of that information ought to be available for the use of the Congress. We seized several hundred million dollars' worth of property belonging to German and Austrian nationals and to American nationals and to nationals from Switzerland and from other countries. Some of the seizures were improper. We have sold considerable property which was seized by the Alien Property Custodian, though there may be a very serious question as to the rightfulness of the sales which were made. We ought to know to whom property has been sold, and the Alien Property Custodian ought to know to whom property has been sold, and the amount received therefrom.

Whenever property is seized the Alien Property Custodian ought to have a record of it, a record of from whom it was taken, the character of trust which is created, and the person in whom possession of the property is left. Considerable of the property which was seized consisted of corporations or the corporate property of corporations. Many of those corporations have been continued in the charge of directors nominated by, or perhaps indicated by, the Alien Property Custodian. Those directors have employed superintendents and lawyers, and those superintendents and lawyers in many instances have been paid for their services, I will not say large sums, but sums out of the funds which came into their hands.

The office of the Alien Property Custodian ought to be familiar with all the attorneys, the agents, and persons in charge of these properties, and they ought to know what has been paid to them, because sooner or later we will have to give an account of our stewardship, we will have to make an accounting to the owners of the property, and if we have sold the property we will have to account for it. If we have converted it, we must make reparation. If we have paid large sums to lawyers and to custodians, we will have to give the names of those to whom payments have been made and the amounts which have been paid to them. If that information is not in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian, it should be. If it is in his possession, it ought to be in such shape that it could be easily collated.

I am not asking anything unreasonable. If the time which has been given is inadequate, if the Alien Property Custodian in good faith is proceeding to obtain this information, and to answer the demands of the Senate and requires additional time, I have not the slightest objection to giving him whatever reasonable time may be required.

If I understand the Senator from New York, he has had some conferences with the Alien Property Custodian, and as a result of those conferences, or as a result of information which he has received, it is his opinion that an unreasonable time has not been consumed in the preparation of the data asked for, and that additional time should reasonably be granted for that purpose. Is that the position of the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Most certainly. I think the adoption of the resolution would be a useless reflection upon an honest officer.

Mr. KING. I think the officer should have communicated more fully with the Senate, stated the length of time which he thought would be required, and asked for additional time, or stated that he could not furnish the information within the time which the resolution seemed to contemplate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is hard to say just what the duty of an officer is under circumstances of that sort; but, Mr. President, the Senator from Utah might have informed himself before offering this second resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the person who was directed to furnish the information might have informed the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was no time limit fixed in the resolution.

Mr. KING. There was no obligation resting on me to run down to the office of the Alien Property Custodian and ask him why he had not answered the resolution adopted by the Senate. I do not know the purpose of the Senator from New York in conferring with him. Of course, it was entirely proper. He may have gone there for the purpose of informing himself as to the reason why the resolution had not been complied with. I might have done it, but I did not. The Senator from New York, who did not offer the resolution, apparently did.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And as a result I got the correct information, and the Senator from Utah got none.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that the information the Senator has been given is correct. No doubt the Senator got some information. As to its correctness, that is a matter about which there may be a difference of opinion. I repeat that the Alien Property Custodian could have informed the Senate of the alleged magnitude of the task, and have indicated that further time was desired before complying with the request. I am perfectly willing that the resolution may go over for a few days so we may determine just exactly what course ought to be pursued, and I do that upon the strength of the statement made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KING. I do not think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance. The first resolution was adopted by the Senate without being referred to the Committee on Finance. If the matter was worthy of reference to the Committee on Finance the first resolution should have gone to that committee. This is simply to determine whether certain information which has been demanded shall be produced.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can not the Committee on Finance determine whether this man has been negligent or not?

Mr. KING. It does not need the Committee on Finance to determine whether he has been negligent. The resolution calls for this information. If the Alien Property Custodian requires additional time he can very easily communicate with the Vice President or with the Senate and state the facts, and there is no doubt in the world but what upon such representations the Senate will give him such reasonable time as he might require, and for that reason I am asking that the resolution lie over, in order to give him the time he might desire.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. The resolution as it is now framed does two things. In the first place, it clearly censures the Alien Property Custodian for not having more promptly answered the original resolution offered by the Senator from Utah. In the second place, it directs him to give the information which the original resolution called for.

Mr. KING. What words does the Senator construe as implying a censure?

Mr. SPENCER. When a resolution is offered requesting that certain things be done, and then, after a certain time a resolution is offered directing that it shall be done, there is no stronger censure which can be implied, and undoubtedly the Senator intended that there should be a censure of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that nearly every resolution which goes to a department directs them to furnish the information desired.

Mr. SPENCER. They are requests.

Mr. KING. No; most of them are directory.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The approved form, and one almost universally adopted when a resolution is sent to an executive department, is to direct the action of the department. When submitted to the President, the word "request" is used.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that the first resolution I offered in the Senate, or was about to offer, I submitted to the Republican leader and to the Democratic leader, and in that resolution I had used the word "request," but they said that the universal practice when asking for information from departments was to use the word "direct."

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is right.

Mr. OVERMAN. What was the interval of time from the offering of the first resolution and the offering of the second one?

Mr. SPENCER. Two months.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then he should be censured. The Senate adopted a resolution asking one of the officers of this Government to furnish a report, and he did not do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator realize what was asked for?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not realize at all what was asked for. Of course, the head of a department ought to be directed when the information is desired, but the Senator was unusually polite and requested him to furnish the information. I understand he has taken two months to answer the resolution. I do not know what was in the resolution. I did not hear what the Senator from New York said.

Mr. SPENCER. I thought I was recognized by the Chair. Am I mistaken?

Mr. KING. I have the floor, and I yielded to the Senator to ask me a question.

Mr. SPENCER. Then I will wait until I can get the floor, because I have something to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from New York informs me that there is a large amount of information being gotten up, and that it is impossible for them to send it now. Of course, I do not want a man to do an impossible thing, but when a department head absolutely ignores a request of the Senate there ought to be something done by the Senate about it.

Mr. LODGE. During the last administration there were over 60 resolutions offered inquiring in regard to Mexico, and I do not think any of them were answered.

Mr. OVERMAN. The responsible parties should have been censured if they did not answer them. That does not alter this case at all. If they can furnish the information and do not, they ought to be censured.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are entirely right; it was a direction in the first instance, and not a request, as I thought. But the difference in the two resolutions is precisely as great as it would have been if the one had been a request and the other a direction, because the original resolution directed that the information be given, in accordance with what the Senator has said is the usual custom. The pending resolution is that he be directed to forthwith report to the Senate, which, of course, implies that he has information which he ought to have transmitted to the Senate before, and that he must do it at once.

Those resolutions are a fair illustration of what I have seen more than once in the Senate; that is, the extravagant demand for the impossible. I wonder if the Senator from Utah has any idea that there are 40,000 trusts——

Mr. KING. I have said that on the floor twenty times.

Mr. SPENCER. That they differ in amount from $1.79 in one trust of which I happen to know, to $4,784,000 in another trust of which I happen to know. There may be larger amounts; there may be smaller amounts. In each one of those there are diversified interests. In some of them there are at least 12 parties having an interest, and when the Alien Property Custodian has a trust involving a certain sum of money, if any part of it is sold, if it is the furniture of a house and a single chair is sold an account must be kept of it, there may be literally hundreds of items in connection with each trust, or with each individual interest in each trust, and I would like to know as a matter of curiosity how much money it will cost to make up the report which I understand is being made up, at a length of which the Senator from New York has already spoken, in order to comply with this resolution. It is stupendous. It is not a request for a statement of fact or for a little information. It is a demand for the compilation of a tremendous volume. Sooner or later, of course, that will be compiled.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it will never be read.

Mr. SPENCER. Of course it will never be read. Sooner or later that will be compiled, and, as the Senator from Utah says, it must be compiled. We must render to every estate a full account of everything we do in regard to it. But to say to the Alien Property Custodian that he must forthwith return to the Senate a report as stupendous as that is unfair, and the resolution ought to go to a committee to find out what the exact facts are. I doubt if the Senator from Utah knew the facts.

Mr. KING. Yes; I did.

Mr. SPENCER. I have confidence enough in his judgment to think that he would never ask for such an expensive, tremendous report, and then insist that within 60 days it be returned or that the Alien Property Custodian be censured by the Senate for not returning it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word or two in reply to my very vehement friends on the other side who have rushed with great impetuosity to the defense of the Alien Property Custodian. I know exactly what was in the resolution, and I drew it with deliberation; I will not say with malice aforethought, in the language of the indictments.

I knew that the information ought to be in the office of the Alien Property Custodian. I knew that the Alien Property Custodian ought to have a record of every trust. I knew from general report and from what little information I could obtain from the office that there were 40,000 or more trusts. I knew that some of the property had been disposed of. I knew that a large number of attorneys had been employed by the Alien Property Custodian and a still larger number had been employed by organizations, corporations, and agents who had been intrusted by the Alien Property Custodian with the possession of property which had been seized. I knew that many of those corporations were paying to those attorneys, to agents, to superintendents, and to supervisors large sums of money out of the funds which they had seized, funds which ought to be conserved in order that in the end they might be returned to the legitimate and proper owners. I was apprehensive, I will say, that some of the information has not been kept or was not available. I knew that the information would be called for sooner or later, and I thought this was an appropriate time to call for the information.

I made inquiry for the report which was due on the 1st of January. It was not available. None had been filed. I made inquiry for the report which ought to have been filed on the 1st of January, 1920, as to the proceedings of the Alien Property Custodian for the preceding year. I was advised that that report had not been filed. My recollection now is, although I may be in error in regard to this, that only one report has been filed since the office of Alien Property Custodian was created.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, what does the resolution require the Alien Property Custodian to furnish? My first idea was that it asked him to furnish the number of employees. I did not know it had reference to every trust and all the property involved.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I read to the Senator, by the courtesy of the Senator from Utah, what the Senator from Utah asks from the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. The original resolution of the Senator from Utah reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Alien Property Custodian is directed to report to the Senate the names of all attorneys who have been appointed or employed by the Alien Property Custodian and the compensation which has been allowed to each, and the character of services performed by each; the names of all attorneys, directors, supervisors, managers, auditors, or other agents appointed by the Alien Property Custodian to take care of or to have the administration of property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian, with the compensation paid to each, or to be paid to each, by the Alien Property Custodian, or out of the trusts or trust funds in his custody; the names of all attorneys appointed or employed by corporations, agents, or individuals who have been or are acting as administrators or caretakers of property for the Alien Property Custodian, and the compensation paid to or to be paid to each; the names of all attorneys who have represented or who now represent claimants to property under the control of the Alien Property Custodian; the names of all attorneys who have represented claimants to whom property has been returned under section 9 of the trading with the enemy act—

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] informs me there are 8,000 of those alone—and the compensation allowed each of such attorneys out of the trusts or trust funds subject to such claims—

And here is a bigger thing than all the others put together:

A statement and description of all property sold by the Alien Property Custodian, with the names of the corporations or persons to whom sold, and the amount received therefor; and a statement and description of all property seized or demanded by the Alien Property Custodian since the passage of the resolution declaring a state of peace to exist with Germany, Austria, and Hungary.

Every bit of that information ought to be on file in that office. Every bit of it ought to be subject to the inspection of those who are interested in it. Sooner or later it all ought to be published, and it ought to be available in case of need at any time. But to say that within a definite time it should be submitted to the Senate of the United States is an unfair imposition upon that office, and to criticize the Alien Property Custodian for not presenting it within 60 days is unjust.

Mr. KING. I do not know what criticism may be implied from the direction. I am not particular about that. Three months ago a resolution was presented and adopted asking for this information. I repeat, that if the Alien Property Custodian has not had ample time to submit it, and the task is very great, there is no doubt that he could have asked for additional time.

Upon a number of occasions since I have been in the Senate, when information has been asked by the Senate from the Secretary of War, he has communicated with the Senate and stated that it was impossible to furnish the information within a reasonable time, and asked if additional time would be permitted. If the Alien Property Custodian needs additional time, there is no difficulty in his obtaining it, and the Senate undoubtedly would extend whatever time was reasonable. I am not asking that he furnish information which he may not furnish, but when two months have gone by and he has not asked for any additional time I feel justified in offering the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it was apparent that the Alien Property Custodian understood and was aware of the size of the task and that he wanted the Senate to know something about it when he received the resolution when it was first passed. The Senator from Utah has left the impression here, or endeavored to leave it, that it was the duty of the Alien Property Custodian to inform the Senate of the size of the task. It so happens that under date of January 13 the Alien Property Custodian addressed a letter to the President of the Senate reading as follows:

ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1922.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
The Capitol, Washington.

SIR: Will you please inform the Senate, in answer to resolution No. 191, that I shall transmit the facts requested as soon as the same may be compiled.

It is respectfully suggested that the resolution covers the work of this office, from its beginning, October 6, 1917, to date, and thus the completion of the information will require a reasonable time consistent with the usual work.

The Senate is further advised that prior to the passage of the resolution this office had begun the preparation of a report substantially covering the information requested as covered in that section of the trading with the enemy act requiring an annual report to be transmitted to the President as soon after January 1 each year as is practicable.

Respectfully, yours, THOMAS W. MILLER,
Alien Property Custodian.

So the Senator was mistaken.

Mr. KING. Oh, no; the Senator was not mistaken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Miller wrote to the Senate, calling attention to the fact that he had received the resolution and would comply with it as soon as possible, and that it would take some time to do it. The Senator from Utah gave the impression a little while ago that it was the duty of the Alien Property Custodian to send some such message to the Senate, but that he had not done it.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was the cause of my remark. I thought he had treated the Senate with contempt.

Mr. KING. The impression which I sought to convey was that if the time—two months—which had been allowed was not sufficient, particularly in view of the mandatory provisions of the statute, and that on the 1st day of January the report which he says was being prepared was not filed, it seemed to me that it was quite proper that a resolution of that character should be introduced.

I think the Senator will bear me out that in some instances, where the statute is apparently mandatory, the report shall be made on the 1st of January, and if it is not made because of circumstances beyond the control of some executive officer, the time is extended within which to file the report. The Alien Property Custodian was required to file a full and detailed report——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I have the statute before me.

Mr. KING. I submit that that is a proper construction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No such report as the Senator calls for.

Mr. KING. It was to be filed on the 1st day of January. The letter which the Senator has just read from Mr. Miller indicates that he is preparing the report which is called for by the statute and that it is substantially the same information as that called for by the resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But not in such detail.

Mr. KING. The Senator read the language. I do not have it in mind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have the statute before me.

Mr. KING. The language I was speaking of is that contained in the letter. Will the Senator call attention again to the language of the letter wherein he refers to the statute and to the report which he is preparing?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. January 13. The language is:

This office had begun the preparation of a report substantially covering the information requested as covered in that section of the trading with the enemy act requiring an annual report to be transmitted to the President as soon after January 1 each year as is practicable.

Mr. KING. Obviously the Alien Property Custodian considers that a report covering substantially the information which I have asked is required in January of each year, and had that report been forthcoming and filed this resolution would not have been introduced.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If that report had been forthcoming it would not have satisfied the Senator from Utah. His request contains much more than the custodian is required to submit to the Senate—infinitely more. If the Senator will read the statute he will see that is correct. The truth of the matter is that the Senator from Utah has embarked upon a fishing excursion, and that he did not realize the ocean was so big and deep.

The act reads in part as follows:

Provided further, That the President shall cause a detailed report to be made to Congress on the 1st day of January of each year of all proceedings had under this act during the year preceding. Such report shall contain a list of all persons appointed or employed, with the salary or compensation paid to each.

Read in context with the rest of the section, that refers to the employees or appointees made by the President in the administration of the office of the Alien Property Custodian, not all the attorneys of claimants, former claimants, attorneys for existing claimants, not all the directors, storekeepers, guardians, and watchmen employed by corporations taking care of property which has been taken over by the Government. Nothing like that was ever intended, nor does it require a detailed statement of every single sale, even down to something that was worth $1.48, which I saw was the amount of one of the items. The law calls for—

A statement of the different kinds of property taken into custody and the disposition made thereof.

In other words, a general classification into kinds and character. It was never intended, and surely the Senator from Utah will not contend that this annual report was to cover all the details which his original resolution would cover. It could not possibly be.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that I have no doubt the Alien Property Custodian under law, as trustee, owed it to the Government, as well as he owed it to the persons whose property was sequestered, to——

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is all a matter of public record. Anyone who is interested can go to the office and examine it.

Mr. KING. I was not able to complete my sentence. It was his duty to file a complete statement or to have a complete statement in his office of all property seized and all property disposed of. If the trustees of the property——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I did not yield for a speech. I should like to finish, if the Senator does not mind.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have a letter from Mr. Miller, Alien Property Custodian, addressed to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who is absent to-day. The Senator from New Jersey had this letter placed in my hands. It is addressed to him under date of February 23, 1922, and I think it well that the letter should go into the RECORD. In that letter Mr. Miller said:

Replying to your personal note of February 20, I have not as yet sent to the Senate the information requested in Senate resolution 191, introduced by Senator KING.

It would seem, may I interpolate, that another Senator took the trouble to inquire why it had not come.

To date the compilation has taken 3,500 typewritten pages and my office is working overtime on same. I can not predict as to just when they will have it finished, but it will be some weeks, as I have reduced my force considerably and all this work has to be done in addition to the routine daily work, which is taxing them to the utmost as it is. You can use this information if you want, if your colleague from Utah complains about our delay on the floor of the Senate again.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the letter submitted and the statement of the Senator from New York, I have no objection to the resolution lying over, but I shall give notice to call it up again if, after a reasonable time, no further information is obtained. I shall not ask for its adoption, but I ask that it go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. SPENCER. Just a moment, Mr. President. I was in hopes the Senator would withdraw the resolution or else let it go to the committee. It is not fair to have the resolution lying on the table subject to being called up at any time when there may be few or many in the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I shall give notice to the Senator, who seems to be such an ardent champion of the Alien Property Custodian, when I intend to call it up.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not feel like withdrawing my motion.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; wait a minute and let us see if we can not reach a compromise.

Mr. KING. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been trying to get the floor in order to conciliate these fighting brigades which are on each side of me and which have filled me with a great deal of fear and trepidation.

Mr. President, the resolution, of course, in view of the disclosure of facts that has been made, ought not to be passed by the Senate. There is no reason why such a resolution should go to a committee calling for information. If we do anything with it at all, it ought to pass, but it is conceded now that the resolution ought not to pass, because the Alien Property Custodian is doing all he can to comply with the requirements of the first or original resolution. That is developed from the disclosure of the facts, particularly from the letter which has been read.

The Senator from Utah is willing that the resolution should lie on the table. It seems to me that is a reasonable compromise. I would not want to censure the Alien Property Custodian, and would not want to take any action that could possibly be construed into censure. It seems to me, and I think I am a disinterested witness, that he has been doing his duty, and has been doing the best he can to comply with the request of the Senate. At the same time I can see how the Senator from Utah might become impatient and offer the second resolution. It is all made plain now, and it seems to me that we ought to let the matter rest in statu quo.

I wish to say, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah, in introducing this resolution, is performing a public service. Everyone knows that there has been a great deal of talk and censure concerning the conduct of the Alien Property Custodian's office. We hear it everywhere on the streets; we receive inquiries in the mail; we hear Senators talking about it. Suggestions are being made, frequently vague and indefinite, about things that have been going on in regard to the conduct of that office and the immense millions of property that have come under its control. It is charged very often that favorite attorneys have been paid fabulous fees, and that other things along similar lines have happened.

The law provides that a report shall be made on the 1st of every January, but that report has not been made. That practically gives some ground for suspicion; but I hope when the report comes in it will make everything clear and that no fraud or any wrongdoing will be found to attach to the skirts of any person. At least, however, under the circumstances, the country ought to know the facts which are called for by the resolution of the Senator from Utah.

It is a difficult task to compile the information, perhaps, but it would not be so difficult if this office had been doing its duty and making the report which the law provides shall be made by the 1st of January in each year. That, I repeat, has not been done. It may cost considerable money to comply with the resolution, but we can not afford to let the question pass unnoticed. The country wants to know, and has a right to know, just what has been done with this property which is held in trust and which it is conceded belongs to somebody else, and Congress ought to be interested in knowing that it has been handled properly. I hope the information which may be obtained will disclose that none of the prevalent rumors are well founded and that the Government officials who have been holding trust property have clean skirts.

I should not like to have this resolution referred to a committee. It seems to me, I will say to the Senator from New York, if it is referred to a committee, under the circumstances, such action might be construed as a reflection upon the Alien Property Custodian. It would have been more reasonable to refer the first resolution, it seems to me, which merely called for information. Of course, nobody wants to see the resolution passed now, and if I were compelled to vote now I would vote against it; and yet I would not want to be required to vote, because a vote against the adoption of the resolution might be construed as an indication that the Senate does not want this information. The only question is whether the custodian should not be given a reasonable opportunity to furnish the information, which it seems to me, under the circumstances, he has not yet had. So, in my opinion, we ought to let the matter rest where it is for the time being.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if I can have a complete understanding with the Senator from Utah that he will not again bring up the resolution without due and proper notice, I shall withdraw my motion to refer, because I realize that there is not a quorum present, and I do not want to put the Senate to the inconvenience of having a quorum called.

Mr. KING. Of course, I shall be glad to give ample notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Vice President appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have two letters from the Chief of Engineers of the Army with reference to river and harbor projects which ought to be printed as Senate documents for use in connection with consideration of legislation having to do with the subject. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the two letters may be printed separately as Senate documents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If there is no further legislative business to be considered, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 9, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed Heavenly Father, we give Thee thanks for the sacred gift of life. With us may the fundamental thing be to live wisely. For this high purpose may this great, strange, wondrous world be a schoolhouse in which we have a yearning sense of incompleteness. Let us remember each day to stress the unrealized, and thus grow in knowledge and wisdom. May thoughts, aspirations, and loves—all fine nobilities—fill up the open spaces of our lives. Let the full-toned music of peace bless our land and rest like a divine benediction everywhere. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to state to the House that he expects to leave to-night for an absence of about a week. He has the right under the rules to designate a Speaker pro tempore for three days, but he thought, perhaps, it would be preferable to the House instead of waiting until the three days were up and electing a Speaker pro tempore to do it now. He makes that suggestion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the Chair and following the wish of the Chair I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, of Massachusetts, be elected Speaker pro tempore to discharge the duties of the Chair during the absence of the Speaker, not to exceed 10 days.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will notify the President and the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope and the House hopes that the Speaker will return entirely recovered. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thanks the gentleman.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll.

When the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands was called—

APPLICATION OF THE RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, by authorization of the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 4382.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska calls up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. How much time is to be given to debate, and how is it to be divided? I am a member of the committee, and I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is to be decided by the committee; but the rule provides two hours of general debate, one to those in favor of the bill and one to those against. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4382, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4382, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire as to the division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, there are two hours of time allotted, and I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is a short bill; let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the purposes of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and known as and called the reclamation law, the Secretary of the Interior may enter into contract with any legally organized irrigation district whereby such irrigation district shall agree to pay the moneys required to be paid to the United States, and in such event water-right applications on the part of landowners and entrymen, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be dispensed with. In the event of such contract being made with an irrigation district, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may contract that the payments, both for the construction of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, on the part of the district shall be made upon such dates as will best conform to the district and taxation laws of the respective States under which such irrigation districts shall be formed, and if he deem it advisable he may contract for such penalties or interest charges in case of delinquency in payments as he may deem proper and consistent with such State laws, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6 of the reclamation extension act approved August 13, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 686). The Secretary of the Interior may accept a partial payment of the amount due from any district to the United States, providing such acceptance shall not constitute a waiver of the balance remaining due nor the interest or penalties, if any, accruing upon said balance: Provided, That no contract with an irrigation district under this act shall be binding on the United States until the proceedings on the part of the district for the authorization of the execution of the contract with the United States shall have been confirmed by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, or pending appellate action if ground for appeal be laid.

SEC. 2. That patents and water-right certificates which shall hereafter be issued under the terms of the act entitled "An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1912 (37 Stats. L., p. 265), for lands lying within any irrigation district with which the United States shall have contracted, by which the irrigation district agrees to make the payment of all charges for the building of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, shall not reserve to the United States a lien for the payment of such charges; and where such a lien shall have been reserved in any patent or water-right certificate issued under the said act of Congress, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered to release such lien in such manner and form as may be deemed effective; and the Secretary of the Interior is further empowered to release liens in favor of the United States contained in water-right applications and to assent to the release of liens to secure reimbursement of moneys due to the United States pursuant to water-right applications running in favor of the water users' association and contained in stock subscription contracts to such associations, when the lands covered by such liens shall be subject to assessment and levy for the collection of all moneys due and to become due to the United States by irrigation districts formed pursuant to State law and with which the United States shall have entered into contract therefor: Provided, That no lien reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate heretofore and hereafter issued under the reclamation law shall be released unless and until the patentee or water-right applicant shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection of such tax by and through such irrigation district for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation: Provided further, That before any lien is released as provided in this act the Secretary of the Interior shall first favorably find and file a report in writing, which shall show that the irrigation district is legally formed and organized under the State law in which the irrigation district is situated, with full power to enter into such contract with the United States; and full power and authority to collect by assessment and levying all of the money then due, or to become due, and payable to the United States, by the irrigation district on all valid and now effective contracts and obligations by and from all water users holding land or entries within the district due the United States; and that the lands should be subject to assessment and levy, in accordance with the law under which the irrigation district is organized, for the collection of all money due the United States.

SEC. 3. That upon the execution of any contract between the United States and any irrigation district pursuant to this act the public lands included within such irrigation district, when subject to entry, and entered lands within such irrigation district, for which no final certificates shall have been issued and which may be designated by the Secretary of the Interior in said contract, shall be subject to all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to promote the reclamation of arid lands," approved August 11, 1916: Provided, That no map or plan as required by section 3 of the said act need be filed by the irrigation district for approval by the Secretary of the Interior.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 4, strike out, beginning with line 6, the remainder of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That no such lien so reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate shall be released until the owner of the land covered by the lien shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection by such irrigation district of taxes against said land for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation: Provided further, That before any lien is released under this act the Secretary of the Interior shall file a written report finding that the contracting irrigation district is legally organized under the laws of the State in which its lands are located, with full power to enter into the contract and to collect by assessment and levy against the lands of the district the amount of the contract obligation."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be informed when I have spoken for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LITTLE. As to the other hour, who controls that?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Chair would recognize some member of the committee who is opposed to the bill for one hour.

Mr. LITTLE. I am opposed to the bill, and I ask for recognition.

Mr. KINKAID. The gentleman from Kansas will be allowed to control half the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the ranking member on the minority side opposed to the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I think the gentleman from Kansas is entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas to control the other hour.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of permitting me to ask for a conference on the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. KINKAID. I have no objection to that, and I yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4382, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10101, being the District of Columbia appropriation bill, just passed by the Senate with certain amendments, disagree to all the amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10101, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference on a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Speaker appointed the following conferees:

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

APPLICATION OF RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4382), and the gentleman from Connecticut will take the chair.

The committee resumed its session, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is recognized.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this Congress very laudably has passed several enactments for the benefit of agriculture. The bill which is before us for consideration now is intended for the further benefit of agriculture and it is intended to benefit real dirt farmers. It is intended to put all dirt farmers on an equal footing so far as the benefits of the Federal farm land bank act go. Its purpose is to afford farmers under Government reclamation projects equal opportunity with farmers in the humid regions to secure a loan of the Federal farm land banks. The Federal farm land bank act very appropriately provides that the mortgages taken shall constitute a first lien upon the mortgaged farm. The Federal reclamation law as amended provides that in the issuance of patents for farm units in certain cases—that is, where the payments have not all been made—in those patents it shall be specified that the Government retains a lien for the unpaid cost of construction.

This specific lien provided in the law stands in the way of farmers under irrigation projects, where they have not paid up for all the construction charges, securing loans from the Federal farm land banks. Now, the principal purpose of the bill in behalf of farmer water-users is to remove that obstacle, but at the same time not to impair the lien of the Government for the amount due it for the construction of the irrigation works, and the provisions of the bill will effect that end.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Just for a question.

Mr. LONDON. Now, the new lien that this law contemplates is a lien for taxes?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; when an assessment and levy thereof is made, perhaps that becomes equivalent to a lien.

Mr. LONDON. Then it is a lien on the farm anyway; is it not?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; it may be for that single assessment and levy thereof.

Mr. LONDON. What difference will that make, then, to the bank who is asked to make a loan to the farmer? Now, there is a lien called a mortgage. You intend to substitute for the now existing lien a lien for taxes. The amount of the lien will be the same. You are merely changing the name.

Mr. KINKAID. I am just getting to that. If I do not explain it sufficiently, ask further questions and I will undertake to answer them.

The bill provides in the first section that in carrying out the purposes of the act of June 17, 1902—in other words, the general reclamation law—that the Secretary of the Interior may enter into contract with any legally organized irrigation district whereby such irrigation district shall agree to pay the moneys required to be paid to the United States, and in such event water-right applications on the part of landowners and entrymen, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be dispensed with. This language authorizes the taking of the district collectively, taking the lands of the district collectively, for the payment of the cost of the construction of the irrigation works, in lieu of holding each farm unit singly for its proportionate share of the cost of the construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has consumed five minutes.

Mr. KINKAID. I shall have to take five minutes more until I can explain the bill.

The bill further provides that no contract with an irrigation district shall be binding until the proceedings organizing the district and contracting therewith shall be confirmed by a court of competent jurisdiction. And it further provides that after such confirmation it will be further necessary for the water users in each case, or the owner of the farm unit in each case, to contract in writing with the Secretary of the Interior that he will be bound by the new arrangement and will pay his proportionate share. The bill further requires that before the individual water user's lands are released from liability the Secretary of the Interior shall find that the proceedings are correct; that the district is formed in accordance with the laws of the State in which the district is situated, and that the contract binds the district fully for the liability of the payment of all the construction charges, which liability hitherto rested upon the separate farm units.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Referring to the proviso at the bottom of page 2, just how is it meant that the proceedings shall be drawn into court? Is that an ex parte proceeding?

Mr. KINKAID. All parties are given notice. The laws provide specifically for that. The irrigation laws in each State provide specifically how they shall be brought into court.

They are to notify the individual water user, and a public notice is to be given that will bind the land, and in the decisions of the several courts it is held that it is an action in rem, and jurisdiction of the lands will be secured; even an individual owner may personally be missed.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This proviso seems to contemplate that the authorization of the execution of a contract shall be brought in question in some way and decided by a court.

Mr. KINKAID. The Government may raise that question. The Government is at liberty to raise that question and any water user is at liberty to raise that question.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is just the point I wanted to clear up. Is it meant that none of these proceedings shall be considered legal until some one shall draw them in question, and then the court shall adjudicate the question? Is it meant that a friendly suit shall be instituted?

Mr. KINKAID. It is meant that a confirmatory decree shall be essential before the contract shall go into operation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I wondered whether a friendly suit should be instituted to test the validity of the contract.

Mr. KINKAID. It is understood that a legally instituted suit shall be essential, and there need not necessarily be any strife, but it must conform with the statute. All the phases of the case must be placed before the court for its consideration.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think our Federal courts have held that before they take jurisdiction of matters of this kind it must be a real adversary proceeding and not for the purpose of settling the constitutionality. I wondered whether we were to authorize a friendly suit to be brought.

Mr. KINKAID. The courts have recognized that the confirmatory proceedings are adequate in every respect.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This proviso seems to indicate that this contract to take over this lien must be adjudicated in some court, in some form of proceeding, before it shall be effective.

Mr. BIRD. In the nature of a declaratory judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has consumed five minutes more.

Mr. KINKAID. I shall have to take a few minutes more.

The lien having been properly discharged in consequence of the confirmatory decree of a court having competent jurisdiction, and that being followed by a favorable decision of the Secretary of the Interior, then the contract goes into operation, and thereafter the Government, instead of that specific lien, enjoys the right to make an assessment and levy through the irrigation district, or rather the irrigation district is required to make an assessment and tax levy for the amount required by the Government, and this assessment, when made and levied, becomes an obligation upon all the land within the district for the amount due the Government, and can be enforced by law as a levy and collection of a tax for municipal purposes may be enforced.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. The district is responsible, then, for the collection?

Mr. KINKAID. It is an agency for the collection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Also for the payment?

Mr. KINKAID. Also for the payment and itself liable therefor, and aside from the benefit it will be to these borrowers of the farm land banks, the Government, I am assured by the reclamation officials, will be provided with better security in every instance, because without this a good many of the lands that have been brought under irrigation will be subject to the payment required of the district, which, without this act, would not be so subject, and in many instances the security of the Government for the amount due it is materially increased.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. How much does it cost to irrigate an acre of that land?

Mr. KINKAID. It may reach all the way from $20 to $100 an acre.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I am speaking of this particular land in question.

Mr. KINKAID. All the semiarid West is involved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Not more than $100 an acre?

Mr. KINKAID. Well, there may be some instances where it costs more than $100 an acre.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. It averages from $20 to $100?

Mr. KINKAID. It might average $40 or $50.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. How does a district form an organization?

Mr. KINKAID. The district is formed first by the water users circulating a petition, embracing all the water users and all the territory to be affected and comprehended within the boundaries of the district; and then if a sufficient number shall sign the petition the county board is required to call an election for that purpose, and when the election is called and a majority votes for a district, then it is declared to be carried, and they take the further steps.

Mr. STEPHENS. That will comprise that irrigation district?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; that will comprise that irrigation district.

Mr. LONDON. Is that by operation of State laws?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; that is by operation of State laws exclusively.

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. BIRD. In the event a particular landowner has discharged all his obligations to the Government, will this permit the district then to put back the lien on his title?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; even if he has paid his share. But those matters are thoroughly adjusted by the district as between water users. No one pays more than his share finally if it can be avoided.

Mr. BIRD. Does it make a lien of the district on his title?

Mr. KINKAID. No.

Mr. BIRD. Then the lien would not be against the entire district?

Mr. KINKAID. A lien would accrue to the Government eventually if it were necessary to a complete recovery on all the property in the district.

Mr. BIRD. That will be adjusted?

Mr. KINKAID. That will be adjusted by the district.

Of the numerous decisions made by the courts of last resort of the irrigation States of the semiarid West upholding the irrigation district laws passed by the States I shall cite a few of those estimated to be the leading cases.

They are Pioneer Irrigation District v. Walker (20 Idaho, p. 605), Knowles v. New Sweden Irrigation District (16 Idaho, p. 217), Little Walla Walla District v. Preston (46 Oreg., p. 5), Hall v. Hood River District (57 Oreg., p. 69), Anderson v. Grand Valley Irrigation District et al. (35 Colo., p. 525), O'Neill v. Yellowstone Irrigation District (44 Mont., p. 492), Board of Directors v. Peterson (4 Wash., p. 147), San Diego v. Linda Vista Irrigation District (108 Calif., p. 189), Modesta v. Tregea (88 Calif., p. 324), Board of Directors of Alfalfa Irrigation District v. Collins (46 Nebr., p. 411), Clark v. Cambridge et al. (45 Nebr., p. 798), Paxton-Hershey Co. v. Farmers' & Merchants' Co. (45 Nebr., p. 884), and Cummings v. Hyatt (54 Nebr., p. 35).

Of the several decisions made by the Supreme Court of the United States upholding the constitutionality of the irrigation district laws passed by the semiarid States of the West I cite the following: Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (164 U. S., p. 112, and 87 U. S., p. 165).

On the principle involved I cite also Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, pages 749, 750.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, when the reclamation act was passed in 1902 the law relating to the formation of irrigation districts in the Western States was not well developed. In the 20 years that have elapsed since that time every State where irrigation agriculture is practiced has adopted an irrigation district law. These State laws have been construed and interpreted by the courts until to-day there exists well-defined body of law with respect to irrigation districts, how they shall be created, what their functions and limitations are.

It was therefore but to be expected that when the original reclamation act was passed Congress should and did provide that for the money advanced by the United States for the construction of reclamation projects there should be obtained an individual promise to pay from each water user upon the several projects. If private land was included within a project there was a contract in the form of a water-right application between the owner of the land and the Government providing for the payment of the construction charge. If it was public land there was a reservation in the patent providing that the entryman would pay the amount due the United States. In each case there was created a first lien upon the land.

It has been demonstrated in the past two decades that by forming irrigation districts the community effort that is necessary to successfully develop a reclamation project can best be carried out. Anyone who stops to think will agree that a promise to pay made by all of the water users on a project, each one standing as surety for the other, is vastly better security for the repayment of the sums due to the United States than the individual obligations of water users, and that is why I unhesitatingly assert that the enactment of this bill provides a means whereby there will be less risk of the loss of any part of the money expended out of the reclamation fund. And this is the reason why it has been the practice of the Reclamation Service of late years, wherever a new project is to be undertaken, to require that an irrigation district be organized under the laws of a State wherein the project is located.

The Federal farm loan act provides that nothing but a first mortgage shall be the basis for a loan, so that when applications were made by water users for loans on lands within projects where individual first lien contracts existed the Federal Farm Loan Board ruled that a first mortgage could not be given because of this first lien to the Government, and therefore no Federal farm loans have been made to water users on such Federal reclamation projects. But wherever an irrigation district exists the Federal land banks freely make loans exactly as if the land was within a drainage district, or a road district, or other legally organized municipal corporation having the power to tax the lands within its limits.

The Federal Farm Loan Board holds that the lien created by assessments levied by an irrigation district are no different than the lien for taxes due to a county or to the State, and therefore the water user can give a first mortgage upon his land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. I asked the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] if irrigation districts were not organized now which agreed to pay taxes for water rights. I understood him to say that he did not know of any, and that no member of the committee had called his attention to any such case. May I ask the gentleman if that is not a very frequent method pursued under the reclamation act?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The latest example is the King Hill project in Idaho, authorized three years ago by the sundry civil appropriation act, wherein it is specifically provided that a contract shall be entered into between the United States and an irrigation district organized under the laws of that State. There is no kind of an individual contract with any water user under that project.

Mr. LITTLE. Has it ever been decided in the courts of the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. There has been no necessity for such a test, because the legality of the district was first decided by the courts of the State.

The question is asked, "If a water user had paid the full amount due can he then be taxed to make up the delinquency of his neighbor?" If a person is to receive no benefit his land should be left out of the district. But if his land is included in the district, the assessments are levied according to the benefits. There are many instances where one man must of necessity, because he receives a greater benefit, pay a greater tax, and as a practical matter the tax can be thus collected without difficulty.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then the man who has already paid his assessments to the Government will not be retaxed?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no practical difficulty about that.

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. BIRD. Could he be forced into the district?

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand the law relating to the creation of a drainage district, or an irrigation district, or a road district, or a school district, or any other municipal organization, when the time comes to fix its limits, any person can successfully resist having his land included within the district by showing that he will receive absolutely no benefit from it. That is the general rule in regard to the creation of special municipal districts for particular purposes.

I can discuss this bill without prejudice because the two United States reclamation projects in my State have not been organized as irrigation districts and there is no immediate prospect that either of them will be. The Salt River Valley Water Users' Association, now in control of the Salt River project, was organized in the ordinary manner under the incorporation laws of the then Territory of Arizona. The association, as a corporation, has contracted with the Secretary of the Interior to pay the entire amount due each year for the construction of the project. For that reason this water users' association has been deemed by the Federal Farm Loan Board to be, in effect, an irrigation district and loans have been made to many farmers under the project.

The only applications that have been denied, which otherwise would have been approved, are in cases where there is a reservation in the patent as issued of a first lien to the United States for the construction charges remaining unpaid. In my opinion this is a mere technical objection, which should be waived by the Farm Loan Board, because, after all, the Salt River Valley Water Users' Association, as a whole, is fully and completely responsible for the entire sum due to the United States, and therefore this individual lien will never be enforced.

The operation and maintenance of the Yuma reclamation project is still in the hands of the United States Reclamation Service. The Yuma County Water Users' Association has not agreed to pay the entire construction charge, so that the only security that the Government has is evidenced by the promises to pay contained in the water-right applications made by the water users, each for himself and not for his neighbors. The existence of these individual first liens is the reason given by the Federal land bank for its refusal to make loans on lands within this project.

It is my honest judgment that such loans would be just as safe and without the slightest increase of risk of loss as loans now being made on lands within irrigation districts. The land is absolutely valueless without water, and, therefore, whoever owns it is certain to protect his water right by paying the sums due for reclamation charges. The Federal Farm Loan Board, however, insists that there can not be two first liens in existence at the same time on the same tract of land, and has thus far declined to approve applications for loans on lands within the Yuma reclamation project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall use that much time.

Mr. Chairman, the national reclamation law provides that the construction charges shall be determined with a view of returning to the reclamation fund the estimated cost of construction of the project and shall be apportioned equitably. In practice the charges apportioned against the land are apportioned in proportion to the benefit derived from the construction of the project, and they may be much more per acre on one part of a project than upon another, depending upon the greater cost of construction on a particular unit of the project; depending upon whether or no the land had a partial water right before the project was undertaken, and therefore did not require a full and complete additional water right.

Several difficulties have arisen under the reclamation law that are sought to be cured by this legislation. Some of them grow out of the fact that the water user desires to have more to say and ought to have greater responsibility in connection with the management of the project. There are difficulties that arise from the collection of the charges from the individual. Much complaint arises from the fact that the water user on a reclamation project, although he may have paid a large proportion of the charges against his tract and may have a very large equity over and above the sum due the Government, can not secure a loan under the farm loan act because the reclamation lien is a prior and first lien upon his land. Those who propose this legislation have hoped to cure these situations by this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] made a statement a moment ago to the effect that the Farm Loan Board during the last year or two had been considering these liens in the nature of a tax instead of a mortgage, and that they have been loaning money to farmers despite that. I understood the gentleman from Arizona to have made that statement a little while ago.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Arizona. But it is clear that, as matters now stand, the Farm Loan Board can not make a loan to an individual upon these projects, the security for which shall be the land upon which the Federal Government has a prior lien. It is believed that it is wise to have organizations to which the Government shall look for the charges against the land on reclamation projects, rather than look to the individual directly. The Reclamation Service has for years encouraged the organization of irrigation districts, and there are now a dozen or more contracts outstanding, as I understand it, whereby the water users as a body, as a whole, become responsible for all of the charges. A very conspicuous case of that kind is the Salt River project, in Arizona. More recently the King Hill project has been organized into what I understand to be a municipal corporation. The Salt River project is not a municipal corporation, but is an organization of water users contracting with the Government.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In those districts to which the gentleman has just referred, does the United States Government retain no lien upon the land itself?

Mr. MONDELL. The United States Government has a contract with these people, and in case the contract is not carried out, then the original Government lien attaches. That is the form of those contracts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. It strikes me under this proposed measure the Government is giving up its lien, that it has no lien whatever upon the real estate for the payment of these amounts due from the water users, and in lieu of the lien is obtaining a contract right with the irrigation district.

I have no doubt it is a very valuable contract right, and that the amounts will be paid; but, as I understand the act, the United States Government is surrendering all liens upon the land, so that the United States has no way of enforcing the liens as such, but must be dependent upon the irrigation district to get its money paid to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming the organization of a legally formed municipal corporation, pledging all the land values within the project, it is very patent to everyone that the Government loan is better secured in that way than it would be by a direct lien upon the land held by the individual.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. There has been some question raised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and others as to whether or no it is possible to organize these districts in a legal form under which the obligation would clearly and unquestionably be binding; but there can be no question but what all of the water users who desire to do so may obligate themselves jointly on behalf of each and all, and if that is done, then there is no such thing as laying an obligation upon an unwilling party; and I assume that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] will not take the position that men can not voluntarily obligate themselves as provided in this act.

Having already severally obligated themselves in a very broad way individually, I do not know how far we could go in obligating them jointly if they were not agreeable to the arrangement. But clearly such an organization as has been perfected on the Salt Creek project is legal and binding. It is believed that the municipal corporation on the King Hill project is binding.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. I assume that if this act passes, the Government authorities having the administration of the reclamation law will be quite certain that the corporations which are formed are legally formed under the State law. Now I yield.

Mr. LITTLE. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to tell the gentleman from Indiana a minute ago that in this King Hill project the Government still retains its lien on the individual land.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I am familiar with all the details of that particular engagement.

Mr. LITTLE. If that is correct, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] was quite wrong in his reply to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MONDELL. But my understanding is that it is in the nature of a municipal corporation which assumes responsibility for all the sums due the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. But still retains its lien upon the individual's land.

Mr. COLTON. Is it not a fact that before the bonds are issued or any steps taken, a court of competent jurisdiction finds by a decree that every step has been taken legally?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather inclined to think that the point raised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], as affecting the bill as now amended, while very interesting from the lawyer's standpoint, does not necessarily affect the validity of the legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. KINKAID. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Because, in the first place, even though it may be true that not every water user on a project could be brought within the district, yet districts could be formed and be workable, even though there were a few under the project who did not expressly individually accept its terms. And furthermore, as we understand the opinion of the people on the project, I assume there would be no difficulty in securing the agreement contemplated by the act, which as a matter of contract would undoubtedly be legal. So much for that.

If we can perfect these organizations the Government will have a better lien for the return of its money than it now has. It would be easier to collect from a single organization than from individuals as a matter of administration, and there could be a very considerable saving to the water users in management.

Further, the settler would then be in a position in which, if his equities were sufficient to warrant, he could secure a loan from the Farm Loan Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired. The time remains as follows: The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] has 28 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] has 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take three minutes in which to answer a little further the question propounded by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in regard to the nature of the lien remaining after the contract is made. The Government gives up its lien on the individual land on consideration that the district becomes responsible as a whole, the Government having a right to have an assessment made on the land and a levy made pursuant to that assessment for the amounts as they become due. When that assessment and levy is made it becomes a liability against the particular farm unit. The amount of the assessment is in proportion to the benefit received by the particular farm unit. Now, that brings me to the further proposition made by the able jurist from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], which involves the question whether it is for a private purpose or for a public purpose.

I have great respect for the decision in the case of Loan Association against Topeka, cited by the gentleman from Kansas. It is sound, and it makes the correct distinction in that case why the statute of Kansas was void, authorizing the voting of those bonds, which was that it authorized the taking of private property for private purposes. The court held that it was a taking of the private property of an individual taxpayer for the benefit of a bridge manufacturing company, a private corporation. In principle this decision sustains the pending bill. But the question involved in the pending bill is whether you can assess these farm units and collect the assessment for the individual benefit each farm unit will receive, all for the public purpose of irrigation of arid lands.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fall Brook Irrigation District against Bradley, a case which went up from the State of California——

Mr. LITTLE. In which volume of the reports is that to be found?

Mr. KINKAID. In 164 United States, at page 112. The court holds that the purpose of these irrigation districts and of the assessments made on the water users is a public purpose.

It is a public purpose and not a private purpose, and the court comments upon the case of the Loan Association against Topeka cited by the gentleman from Kansas this morning, and says that its decision is in harmony with that case. In other words, they distinguish between the case before the court and the one cited by the gentleman from Kansas, and hold that the Kansas act or statute in the Topeka case was unconstitutional because it was taking private property for private uses, but the court holds in this case that irrigation is a public purpose. Both decisions are sound and in principle both sustain the constitutionality of the pending bill on the identical question raised by the gentleman from Kansas. Water used for irrigation is devoted to a public purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. Nobody said it was not.

Mr. KINKAID. It is a public matter, even national, because it covers the whole semiarid West. It is even an international matter, because rivers rising in the United States extend into Canada on the north and the Republic of Mexico on the south. The Milk River flows from Montana into Canada and then back again into the United States. By comity between the two nations they have settled their respective rights. The Colorado runs through several of our States and then into the Republic of Mexico. The Rio Grande River for a long distance constitutes the international boundary line between the two Republics. It is not only a national, but an international matter, hence of wide importance to the public. It is a public matter because of the extent of the semiarid West. It is of concern to the public because the United States has invested $130,000,000 in it. It is a public matter because the semiarid West will produce but little without irrigation.

Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court of the United States held in the case cited by the gentleman from Kansas that the statute was unconstitutional because of the attempt to authorize taxation for a private purpose, but it held that the statutes of California providing for irrigation districts and all the other States that have provided for irrigation districts, these statutes are constitutional because the purpose thereof is for the public benefit.

Now, what does the court say? It says:

If the act violate any provision, expressed or properly implied, of the Federal Constitution, it is our duty to so declare it; but if it does not, there is no justification for the Federal courts to run counter to the decisions of the highest State court upon questions involving the construction of State statutes or constitutions on any alleged ground that such decisions are in conflict with sound principles of general constitutional law. The contrary has not been held in this court by the case of Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655), relied on by the gentleman from Kansas. In that case a statute of Kansas was held invalid because by its provisions the property of the citizen under the guise of taxation would be taken in aid of a private enterprise, which was a perversion of the power of taxation. The case was brought in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas, and was decided by that court in favor of the city. There had been no decision of the highest State court upon the question whether the act violated the constitution of Kansas, and consequently there was none to be followed by the Federal court upon that question. The court held that a law taxing the citizen for the use of a private enterprise conducted by other citizens was an unauthorized invasion of private rights. Mr. Justice Miller said that there were such rights in every free government which were beyond the control of the State.

Mark you, such is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Fall Brook against Bradley.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska has consumed seven minutes.

Mr. KINKAID. Just three minutes more. In Idaho, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Colorado, and Nebraska all the courts of last resort of those States have upheld the constitutionality of their irrigation district laws, and the acts are all alike in the main.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How much money has the Government invested in irrigation throughout the country? I understood the gentleman to say $70,000,000 were involved.

Mr. KINKAID. Much more than that, and the obligation is as good as a gold bond, but it is not yet all due; only a small portion thereof is due.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman agrees with me that in this measure we surrender the lien of the United States upon these lands. We may get something better?

Mr. KINKAID. No; it is like a man selling a farm and giving a deed and taking a mortgage back. He has a vendor's lien, but he gives the deed and takes back a mortgage, and it is practically the same in this case. It is a simultaneous transaction. As soon as the Government wants payment an assessment is made, and it is collected like a tax and can be enforced like a tax. The lands can be sold as they are for tax sales. The collection is as certain as death.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not construe the act as leaving the United States with any lien whatever upon any of these lands. I construe the measure as releasing the lien on the land itself and taking in place a contract obligation of these several districts, fortified by the agreement of the arid district that collects the tax and strengthened by individual agreement by which persons whose land is released shall be subjected to a tax by the district. I understand the obligation of the Government, if this bill is passed, will be to collect from the irrigation district.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the Government has no lien on the land itself which the United States Government could enforce.

Mr. KINKAID. It has a right which it can enforce at any time to have an assessment and levy made whereby payment may be realized. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, not much can be said in three minutes. It seems to me that this is a tempest in a teapot in regard to something that is largely already in operation, as was pointed out in a letter from the chief counsel of the Reclamation Department, inserted in the RECORD of yesterday by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], in which letter he says:

1. The irrigation district is a quasi municipal public corporation with the power to levy assessments against its lands for the payment of its obligations.

2. Congress has in a general way during the past 10 years approved the plan of making contracts between the United States and irrigation districts to provide for the payment of water charges due the United States on Federal irrigation projects.

Then he cites the Warren Act of February 24, 1911, which provides for contracts with irrigation districts, and the extension act of August 13, 1914, section 5 of which authorizes the transfer of the care, operation, and maintenance of Federal irrigation projects to irrigation districts. In section 7 of the last-named act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint irrigation districts as fiscal agents on Government projects. In the Smith Act of August 11, 1916, the public lands of the United States were made subject to assessment and levy of irrigation districts. The sundry civil appropriation act of June 12, 1917, provides that no money shall be expended for drainage on the Rio Grande project except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of all project investments.

The individuals are not obligated at all, and the project was founded on that basis, and the same thing is asked for other projects at this time. A similar provision appears in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 10, 1918. There are many other laws cited covering this same point showing this plan is already in operation at this time and has been for 10 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think that when the Government stands a chance to lose a sum estimated at from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000 it deserves some consideration at the hands of this Committee of the Whole before we take action. I can not quite agree with the reasoning of the proponents of this bill in respect to the effect that it is going to have on this indebtedness to the United States. I can not agree that the Government would have a lien securing this loan or these advances if this bill is passed. It is manifestly true that if the bill be passed we relinquish the lien that the United States now has and substitute for it an irrigation district, with which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to enter into a contract about these advancements and these liens and this indebtedness. If the irrigation district should undertake to organize, I presume it is the intention of everyone that the territory constituting the district will be contiguous, adjacent territory, owned probably by 500 different individuals. Three hundred of these may be heartily in favor of the organization of the district. Suppose they hold a popular election and 300 votes are cast for it and 200 are cast against it. Three hundred of them are obligated and indebted to the United States Government, while 200 have liquidated their taxes and have settled their indebtedness with the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. In just a moment. This district is declared to have been organized. The Secretary of the Interior undertakes to negotiate a contract with this supposed district and does, as a matter of fact, enter into a contract and thereby relinquishes and releases the rights that the Government then has by virtue of the lien on every acre of land embraced within the territory. Let us suppose also that the district decides that it does not intend to pay its obligations for this year. What remedy has the Government to enforce that obligation? None other than to institute a civil suit against the corporation, municipal, quasi public, or private, and take a judgment. That is the remedy that is available at law. Suppose the tax is not levied by the district, and the United States Government undertakes an additional step to enforce it, and issues—if such could be done, and I doubt that it can—a mandamus to compel the irrigation district to levy a tax sufficient to pay the obligations. When that step is taken suppose there be some one taxpayer who was oposed to the plan in the first place, some one who had paid his tax and who owed nothing. Under this proceeding it is attempted to levy that tax, and when it comes to levying that tax on his land he has a right in court, because he has not had his day there as yet, and he institutes an injunction proceeding against the collection of such tax. Would any man say that he could not successfully maintain that suit and enjoin them from imposing a tax on his property with which to liquidate the debts of these delinquent taxpayers?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the contention of my friend from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], in which he cites one lone case, would be correct if this were a private purpose. The case that he cites, of the Loan Association against Topeka, which he calls so frequently the King Bridge case, is the only case upon which he relies in reference to this question. Now, what was involved under this decision? The city of Topeka issued bonds. For what? To build bridges, to a manufacturer to build bridges for a private purpose.

Mr. KINKAID. To help a bridge manufacturer, not to build bridges.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I said for a bridge manufacturer, a private purpose. Well, if it were a private purpose—and there has been a long line of decisions from that good hour to the present—every decision by the State courts and the Supreme Court has overruled the decision cited by the gentleman from Kansas. Now, this is what Judge Peckham said in the supreme court in the case of the Fallbrook Irrigation District against Bradley. This Fallbrook irrigation district was formed, and Mrs. Bradley enjoined the collection of taxes, and it went to the circuit court of appeals, and it was said that it was taking private property without due process of law, and this is what the court said in that case:

We should not be justified in holding the act to be in violation of the State constitution in the face of clear and repeated decisions of the highest court of the State to the contrary, under the pretext that we are deciding principles of general constitutional law. If the act violates any provision, expressed or properly implied, of the Federal Constitution, it is our duty to so declare it; but, if it do not, there is no justification for the Federal court to run counter to the decisions of the highest State court upon questions involving the construction of State statutes or constitutions, on any alleged ground that such decisions are in conflict with sound principles of general constitutional law. The contrary has not been held in this court in the case of Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall. 655). In that case a statute of Kansas was held invalid because by its provisions the property of the citizen under the guise of taxation would be taken in aid of a private enterprise, which was a perversion of the power of taxation. The case was brought in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Kansas, and was decided by that court in favor of the city. There had been no decision of the highest State court upon the question whether the act violated the constitution of Kansas, and consequently there was none to be followed by the Federal court upon that question.

And that case is the only case upon which the gentleman from Kansas relies.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the only case there is on the subject.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But that case has been referred to in this decision and every other decision, I will say to the gentleman from Kansas, in which it stands alone and refers to a private purpose and not a public purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have not the time; I have only five minutes. The organization of an irrigation district is for a public purpose——

Mr. LITTLE. I know.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If you know you ought to state it upon the floor of the House, but the gentleman has not so stated it. Do you know it? Tell the committee so.

Mr. LITTLE. I have.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman said awhile ago that you could not take his home and sell it to pay my debts. I will say to the gentleman that they did it in this very case. They took the home of Mrs. Bradley and sold it to pay the taxes in the irrigation district. That is what this decision states. She enjoined the Supreme Court to reverse the decision of the circuit court of appeals and remanded the case. What are we doing? We are setting a lien upon the individual's land, something that has been done in my State for 25 years, and I dare say in three-fourths of the Western States they have that law permitting the organization of irrigation districts and permitting the collection of taxes. That is all we are doing here. And the gentleman from Tennessee said a few moments ago, "Suppose some citizens of that district object to the collection of the taxes?" That is exactly what they did in this Fall Brook irrigation case. They sold Mrs. Bradley's land. The Supreme Court said they had a right to do it.

Now, gentlemen, there is a long line of decisions here that I could cite, but I want to say this, that this is certainly permitting the borrowing of money on these lands, for which the Federal farm loan act was passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the persuasive eloquence of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and his charming ways almost make us lose sight of the real substance and cause us to follow off after shadows. He talks about waiving the lien of the Government. Now, while it is true that we waive a sort of statutory, technical lien against the individual tracts of land, we really get in substance a better lien upon every acre of land in the district than we have under the present reclamation law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; not now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under the present reclamation law the United States has a lien upon each farm unit. It has a lien upon my land for what it cost the Government to irrigate my land. But if my land becomes worthless by being water-logged the Government will lose every dollar that it put into my particular farm unit, whereas under the provisions of this bill, a bill drafted in the Reclamation Service, approved by the Reclamation Service and its attorneys under the last administration and under this administration, this technical lien that we have to-day is transformed into the obligation of the entire district, and every acre of land in the irrigation district is made liable to pay the contract obligation of the district to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LITTLE. Why should I be taxed to pay your debts?

Mr. SINNOTT. These laws authorizing contracts with the United States have been upon the statute books in the irrigation States for a number of years. They provide, first, in the organization of a new irrigation district they shall vote as to whether or not they shall enter into this contract with the United States.

A new district requires two-thirds of the voters in the district to approve of the contract. In an established irrigation district it is provided that the contract is valid upon the approval of the majority of the landowners in the district. In each instance before the contract is a valid, consummated contract, all of the proceedings must be approved by the court. Then, when those proceedings are approved, the irrigation district laws provide for the levy of an assessment by the board of directors to pay the amounts due the United States. In case the board refuses to make that levy—a thing not to be anticipated—they provide that then the county court must make the levy. It is further provided that in case of the default of the district the United States may take possession of every acre of land in the district and operate the district until the amount in default is fully paid. It is further provided that all the land in the district shall be and remain liable to be assessed for such payments as are covered by the contract with the United States. While that may not technically be called a lien, for all practical purposes it is a lien, and the Government has thus a lien upon every acre of land in the district for every dollar of the district's obligation. Is not that a better lien than one upon each individual holding?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SINNOTT. And it further provides that in case the amount assessed against any tract of land shall not be paid the next assessment against the land in that district shall be so increased as to take care of such default. There is no provision like that in the Federal reclamation laws.

If somebody defaults under the United States reclamation law, the only recourse the Government has under the present reclamation law is to sell the land; but if this bill is passed and this contract is entered into, why then, if anybody defaults in his payment, the next annual assessment will take that up and that will be an obligation and practically a lien against every acre of land in the district.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] has made an argument to the effect that he can not be held for the debt of another person. That very matter has been decided in one of these irrigation district cases. I inserted it in the RECORD yesterday, and it is found on page 3538 of the RECORD which came to us this morning. That was a case involving the Montezuma Valley irrigation district. It is cited in 248 Federal Reporter, page 369. In that case delinquencies were added to the next levy. The court goes on to say:

The trial court was of the opinion that the Colorado statute relating to irrigation districts impliedly prevented an additional levy as demanded by plaintiff, because the statute provided for taxation by special assessment to pay these bonds, that each acre was subject to only the same burden as every other acre for this purpose, and that a requirement of a new levy as prayed would impose an unequal burden upon the land on which the prior levy had been paid.

Then the court goes on to say:

It is a common provision in the State constitutions and statutes that assessments or levies for taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, or by value. Such provisions are not violated when, after the lapse of a reasonable time and after reasonable efforts have been made to collect the first levy, an additional levy is made upon all the property in the district because of the failure of some of the taxpayers to pay their portion of the levy.

And the opinion goes on to hold that the reassessment and the relevying to take up the delinquencies is valid and constitutional. That is an additional protection that the Government secures by virtue of the passage of this bill and the execution of the contracts contemplated thereunder.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman suggests that if this agreement was made you would have a sort of a lien upon the whole district. If the contract is void, you would not have a lien at all?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the contract is void?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman is begging the question. You want to remember that under this bill we are not depending solely upon the validity or the constitutionality of State laws, because before this contract can be entered into, before there is any release by the Government of the lien upon any individual tract of land, that individual must consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection by the irrigation district of taxes to pay the United States. He must consent that the irrigation district has the right to make the assessment and levy against his land for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation. We really make it contractual as well as statutory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in carrying out the purposes of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and known as and called the reclamation law, the Secretary of the Interior may enter into contract with any legally organized irrigation district whereby such irrigation district shall agree to pay the moneys required to be paid to the United States, and in such event water-right applications on the part of landowners and entrymen, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be dispensed with. In the event of such contract being made with an irrigation district, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may contract that the payments, both for the construction of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, on the part of the district shall be made upon such dates as will best conform to the district and taxation laws of the respective States under which such irrigation districts shall be formed, and if he deem it advisable he may contract for such penalties or interest charges in case of delinquency in payments as he may deem proper and consistent with such State laws, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6 of the reclamation extension act approved August 13, 1914 (38 Stats., p. 686). The Secretary of the Interior may accept a partial payment of the amount due from any district to the United States, providing such acceptance shall not constitute a waiver of the balance remaining due nor the interest or penalties, if any, accruing upon said balance: Provided, That no contract with an irrigation district under this act shall be binding on the United States until the proceedings on the part of the district for the authorization of the execution of the contract with the United States shall have been confirmed by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, or pending appellate action if ground for appeal be laid.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendments bills of the following titles:

H. R. 9047. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the town of Winthrop, Mass., a perpetual right of way over approximately 755 square feet of the Fort Banks Military Reservation for the purpose of widening Revere Street;

H. R. 8193. An act to amend the first proviso in an act entitled "An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes," approved June 25, 1906.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 10101. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9597. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918.

APPLICATION OF THE RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I fear that in the discussion of this proposed measure we are attempting to make difficult some things which, if we proceed in an orderly way, step by step, offer very little, if any, difficulty in applying the provisions of the act toward the object sought to be attained.

I shall not attempt to discuss in detail the provisions of the act. That has already been done by other members of the committee. The principal feature of the bill is that which makes it possible for landowners in legally organized irrigation districts to obtain loans from the Federal land banks at a reasonable rate of interest.

There are one or two features of the bill which have been discussed, principally by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], that I think we should consider fully before voting upon the bill. It is contended that any contract entered into under the provisions of this act between an irrigation district and the Government whereby the water district undertakes to pay construction or operation and maintenance charges would be ultra vires; that the lien now held by the Government against the individual tracts of land can not be released and a contract entered into whereby the water district agrees to pay the charges; that the officers of the irrigation district could not lawfully levy a tax upon the landowners to raise funds to satisfy the obligation of the contract.

I think no gentleman of the committee would knowingly vote for a measure that he felt was unconstitutional or that would not be legally enforcible.

If it be true, as contended, that the irrigation district or water users' association has no power to tax, then, of course, this bill ought not to pass. The opponents of the bill overlook the fact that in all the so-called arid-land States laws have already been enacted which provide in great detail for the organization of irrigation districts and water users' associations.

Among other powers conferred upon them they are given the right to levy assessments, to tax the property of the district, and to enter into contracts with the Federal Government for the payment of construction and operation charges.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] denies that the district can tax the landowners to raise money to pay construction and maintenance charges, which under existing law constitute a lien against the land of the individual owner. He relies upon the case of Loan Association v. Topeka (87 U. S., 655). The decision in this case answers every objection that has been urged against this bill. It is true that in the case just cited the court held that the levy of the tax must be for a public purpose. Would the collection of a tax for the purposes mentioned in this bill be for a public purpose? The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in a case arising under a California statute creating irrigation districts that the district had the right to tax and that the use of water for irrigation purposes is a public use.

Under the statutes of the arid-land States the irrigation district created by legislative act is at least a quasi municipal corporation. It levies its taxes in much the same manner as a city or town does. In my own State the officers of the irrigation district determine the amount of money to be raised for any purpose and certify it to the county commissioners, they in turn determine the amount of the levy, and the county assessor extends it upon the tax rolls. The tax is then collected the same as any other special tax.

Now, if the use of water for irrigation is a public use, then the tax to pay construction and maintenance charges is levied for a public purpose.

As I stated a moment ago, these irrigation districts are created by legislative act and are sometimes given broad powers. So long, however, as no right guaranteed to the individual by the constitution of his State or that of the United States is violated the power granted may be broad. It may be even unwise, unjust, or inexpedient, but unless it be repugnant to the Federal Constitution or that of the State the courts can not declare it void.

The courts, as has been well said, are not the guardians of the rights of the people, save when those rights are secured by some constitutional provision. Unless the legislative acts creating these irrigation districts and conferring upon them the power to tax violate some constitutional right of the individual, then the courts themselves can not set them aside. They must be considered as binding and absolute.

I know of no arid-land State that has any provision in its constitution which forbids the creation of these municipal corporations and the conferring upon them of the right to tax, provided that the tax is for a public purpose and affects all persons similarly situated in the same way.

It is difficult, then, to understand why any member of this committee would question the validity of any contract authorized by the terms of this bill. The tax that would be raised to pay the obligation of the contract would be for a public purpose and would affect all similarly situated alike. The granting of the power to tax has not violated any constitutional right, either State or Federal, of the individual. It seems to me plain, then, that the courts would have no power to hold the grant of power to the irrigation district void.

But we do not need to stop here in examining the provisions of the proposed legislation. It is specifically provided that before the Secretary of the Interior shall approve any contract or accept any obligation under the terms of the bill that it shall be made to appear that a court of competent jurisdiction has passed upon the question of organization of the district and has rendered its solemn decree that all preliminary acts have been done as required by law and that all things necessary to validate the contract have been done. In other words, you get just such a decree protecting the Government as is had in most cases before investments are made in municipal bonds.

In addition to all the safeguards to which I have called your attention, this bill requires the Secretary of the Interior to secure the consent of each individual landowner to the proposed contract about to be entered into between the Government and the irrigation district. Each individual must consent to the contract and the tax levy before the Government releases the lien upon his land and looks to the terms of the contract for its money.

So if any question existed, as suggested by some of the members of the committee here on the floor of the House, as to the security of the Government under the contract contemplated by the bill, I maintain as a legal proposition that the individual landowner would be bound by his agreement and estopped to deny the right of the Government to proceed and enforce the contract with the district.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Take a concrete case. Suppose a piece of land is sold under this bill at a forced sale and brings $2,000. The irrigation charges against it, collectible through taxes, are $1,000. They have put a Federal farm loan of $1,500 against it and sold the bond with the Government's sanction that the bond is a mortgage. Who would lose the $500, the Government or the man who in good faith put his money into it with the assurance that the Government had guaranteed it? Suppose the bond of the land bank is sold to a man in Ohio, and under a forced sale the project brings $2,000, who is going to lose the $500?

Mr. MANN. They have a surplus fund in the land banks to cover just such cases.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. The gentleman's illustration is somewhat exaggerated, although it does not exaggerate the legal effect. I can not conceive of any assessment of $1,000 against a farm worth only $2,000. But before the land bank's lien attaches the preliminary steps must have been taken and complied with so that the lien of the land bank becomes a first mortgage on the property. If the land bank has such a lien, it would be simply a case of poor judgment on the valuation of the property, the same as a private individual going out and loaning his money on property that was overvalued. The lien of a legal tax of course would take priority over that of the mortgage.

Mr. BEGG. The point I want to bring out is, Is it possible to put a first mortgage on land that will go ahead of taxes?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I do not think it is. You can take an exaggerated example under almost any law that makes it possible to tax a municipality and make it appear that the lien of a special tax would exhaust the property and leave nothing for the mortgagee. But the amount of the liens against these lands of necessity will never be very large in proportion to the value of the property. Of course the land banks will take these taxes into consideration in making loans after the passage of this act, the same as they do any other tax that might be levied against the property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I shall be glad now to entertain any questions.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has attempted to answer the point that I made, but I do not think that he has answered it. Anyone who has had any dealing in real estate knows that you can not give a first mortgage that will supersede a tax claim.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. That is self-evident under the law, and I have so stated.

Mr. BEGG. Whether it is a sidewalk assessment or whatever it may be; and you are either weakening the security of the Federal Government or else you are fooling the buyer of the farm bonds.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that the Federal farm loan mortgages are all made with that very infirmity, that taxes stand ahead of them everywhere, and there is not a bondholder who has a bond against any particular piece of land.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. That is exactly right. I say that when you consider the provisions of this act together with the existing laws of the several States upon this question the Government gets better security than it is getting under the provisions of the law as it now exists. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, this act briefly summarized provides for the reclamation of arid lands by irrigation districts instead of the Government doing the work and taking liens against individuals in the district where the reclamation is made. Two objections are urged to the bill. The first objection is that the bill is unconstitutional. That question is not involved, it is not even at issue and is not debatable for the very obvious reason that the bill itself provides that unless the irrigation district is legally organized under the laws of the State in which its lands are located, with full power to enter into a contract and to collect by assessment and levy against the lands of the district the amount of the contract obligations, the Government lien is not waived. So that your question of whether it is constitutional or not is not important, because you do not waive your lien unless the act is constitutional.

The second question is this: Does the Government by taking the obligation of this district organization waive its lien upon the land and does it thereby lose an advantage? A reading of the bill convinces me that it does lose its lien upon the land, but that is not as important as the gentlemen who are attacking the bill deem it to be. Here are liens upon the land legally made and by the terms of the bill they are made repeatedly throughout the bill for the benefit of the United States. Suppose the gentleman from Ohio makes a contract with the gentleman from Idaho for my benefit, by which the gentleman from Ohio promises to pay to me, and I am not a party to the contract at all, the sum of $10,000. Suppose the gentleman from Ohio defaults upon that contract. There is no question in law at all but that I could sue the gentleman from Ohio directly and collect the $10,000, and there is no question at all that if these associations fail or default in the payment of their obligations the Government from that moment on, if the irrigation district is a private corporation (as I am told they are in some States), is subrogated to the rights of the district and can collect the balance of the assessments due at that time, and the only chance which the Government is taking is that the association may have collected something up to the time the Government is subrogated, or up to the time when the district defaults, and the Government will lose the amount which the association has collected up to that time. If, on the other hand, the irrigation district is a public corporation or body, the Government can mandamus it, and thus compel it to levy, collect, and pay over the assessments.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Wait a moment, please. I do not regard the chance of making a small loss as important. I do not regard that as a crucial test. I do not regard that as the vital thing in this bill, and if I had to vote against this bill or vote for it without an amendment I would vote for it as it is. It does seem to me, however, that the bill can be amended.

I would vote for it as it is, because I do not believe the Government is going to collect from these individuals with the ease, with the certainty, or in the amount that it will collect from the irrigation districts. I believe that it will make larger collections; that it will get in larger amounts; that the percentage of collections will be very much larger from these irrigation districts than from individuals. It is very easy to correct even this small defect, where the irrigation districts are private corporations, as I am told in some cases they are, and where they take liens for the full assessments on completion of the work, and I suggest that it be corrected in this way by adding, on page 2, line 3, after the words "the United States," the following:

and shall assign the assessments to be collected by the irrigation district from the lands in the district as collateral security to its said agreement to pay.

You then have all that can be obtained; you have the agreement of the irrigation districts, which I assume will be responsible bodies; you have bodies which are not going to run away, which are not in business for the purpose of defrauding, which do not intend to default, which intend in good faith to fulfill their obligations, and which in nine cases out of ten will fulfill their obligations. You have, where the irrigation districts are public corporations, the right to mandamus, and where they are private corporations, if there be such, you have in addition to that the assignments and you hold as collateral to it these very assessments upon these lands. You are not releasing them at all, because where there are public corporations you retain the right to mandamus, and if there should be private corporations, instead of holding them as an original holder, instead of holding them as the lienor, you hold them as the assignee, you hold them all from the one party, and if that party fails to collect you can go on and collect yourself.

I believe that this bill is a bill in the right direction. I believe it is a worthy bill; I believe it should pass, even without the amendment that I suggest; but I do believe, on the other hand, that the amendment which I have suggested will strengthen it, will add to its security to the Government, will make it impossible to say that we are imperiling the $60,000,000 or the $70,000,000 which are owing to the Government, and will free it from all objection and make its passage certain. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. If the right of subrogation exists, as the gentleman says, what would be the remedy of the United States Government in enforcing or collecting these taxes?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It would simply make the irrigation district a party, and it would make each of the landowners a party, and it would simply say, "and the United States hereby asserts that it is subrogated to and claims the benefit of said lien and asks as a remedy to enforce it."

Mr. CLOUSE. But you have no lien; you have released the lien on the land, and you have to levy a tax.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, no. When a man makes a promise for the benefit of another, the party for whose benefit the promise is made, as a matter of law, always has the right to enforce it.

Now, as far as the gentleman from Ohio is concerned, in his question to the gentleman who preceded me, that question is not involved here at all. The question whether the taxes precede a mortgage will remain whether the United States remains the owner of these liens or whether it remains the mere holder of its contract with the irrigation district. In either event there will be assessments on the land which will be liens prior to mortgages given by the landowners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I send to the Clerk's desk the amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Does the gentleman offer his amendment now?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; I offer the amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the words "United States," insert "and shall assign the assessments to be collected from the irrigation district from the lands in the district as collateral security to its said agreement to pay."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not say I am opposed to the intention of this bill. I believe if the farmers under this irrigation bill need any of the benefits of the Federal farm loan bill or the joint-stock Federal farm loan banks they ought to be enabled to get it, providing they can meet the requirements of the Federal farm loan act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I do.

Mr. HAYDEN. We were told at the time the Federal farm loan act was passed that we would be in exactly the same situation that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STEPHENS] is in a drainage district in that State, but as a practical matter we find that we are not, and we are trying to seek this relief. The situation is parallel between a drainage district and an irrigation district.

Mr. BEGG. I will not either argue or dispute that, because I do not see it is relevant to what I want to say. In the first place, what are the bases under which you can get a loan under the Federal farm loan act. Now, the first requisite is that you shall be able to give a first mortgage on the property free of any other lien. Now, that is the first thing. The Government undertakes to tell the buying party of these bonds, we will protect them in so far as we will see that they are free of any encumbrance. We will see that the lenders of the money or the acceptors of the mortgage for which we issue bonds will not loan you more than 50 per cent of the value, and we will see that there is an appraisal over the property on which the loan is to be made. Now, the Government, having accepted that responsibility of the buying public, how can you continue that same security if it is admitted that here is a loan for construction purposes on the property, 90 per cent of which value goes into the land? In other words, if it were not for the irrigation the land would not be worth anything. Now, 90 per cent of the value is an irrigation project, and it is admitted that the Government is now the creditor to the extent of a total of some $60,000,000 or $70,000,000. Let us take a concrete proposition: Say there are 10 farms on 10 irrigation projects. They form an irrigation association and accept as the responsibility of the organization the responsibilities of the individuals. My friend from Cincinnati, Congressman STEPHENS, tried to make a parallel between this condition and the city. Why, there is no parallel between the two. It is true that if a paved street passed my property, even though I do not want it, they can assess against my property and collect it by taxation. That is exactly all you can do by this project. So far they are parallel. But I can not borrow money on my city property with that as a lien against it, because I can not comply with the Federal farm loan statute, and if I sell my property and give a title in clear, tell the buyer I will give him a title free of all encumbrance, and there is an assessment of any amount against that property, whether $2,000 or $5,000, it does not make a bit of difference.

Mr. LINEBERGER. But he does not, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BEGG. He does it. I made a real estate deal within the past six months in which there was a lien against it for street, sewer, and sidewalk assessment. The seller gives it free of all encumbrance, a first-mortgage deed. I put that in, and after it was checked up in court we found a good many dollars of lien in the way of street and sewer assessment against that property. Now, who loses it? I certainly do not, because I have a guarantee warranty deed from the man who sold it. Now, I maintain this is the identical situation in regard to these irrigation situations. Of course, if these irrigation assessments are only $5 or $10 I do not know, but my understanding is that some of these irrigation assessments are pretty high as compared with a forced sale price. But to go back to my illustration I gave my friend from Utah on the floor a while ago, suppose that a plat of land brings $2,000 under a forced sale. Say that they borrowed under the farm loan act $1,500 and the assessment against it is $1,000. There is certainly a shrinkage of $500 which somebody has to bear. Now, the United States is the quasi creditor in one instance and it is the absolute creditor in the other instance. It is the creditor for construction work in an irrigation project. Will the United States lose? No; because this bill says that the irrigation project assessment can be levied and collected as taxes, and all taxes come ahead of a lien.

Then, on the other hand, who will lose? Will the bank, which loaned $1,500 to the man, lose the $500? Certainly not, because he has certified to the Federal Farm Loan Board here in Washington that that title has been examined and has been found free of all encumbrances, except from these taxes which we are trying to legalize. He holds a bond of $1,500, and on the market it is worth only $1,000. I am in favor of the proposition, if we can do it without impairing our moral honesty to protect the public buyers of bonds. Who is going to be responsible for the $500 shrinkage in that hypothetical case?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Suppose the Federal farm loan bank has a loan of $2,000 on a parcel of land involved in this bill and suppose there is a lien on that land for reclamation purposes of $500, does it make any difference to the Federal farm loan bank whether that loan is held by the United States or whether it is held by the irrigation district? It is a lien in exactly the same way.

Mr. BEGG. He could not get his loan unless he nullifies the lien.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask as to the parliamentary situation. Is it on the motion to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, if it makes no difference whether this $500 loan is held by the irrigation district or by the United States, how can this bill affect the question in which the gentleman is interested?

Mr. BEGG. Simply in this way: You are undertaking by the passage of this bill to nullify the Federal Government's lien for irrigation purposes so far as the ability of the Farm Loan Board goes to make a loan, but you are not surrendering your priority rights in the collection of the lien.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not find anything here that affects——

Mr. BEGG. That is the whole tenor of the argument, as I understand it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will be glad to see anything in the bill to that effect. I can not find it.

Mr. BEGG. If I understand the bill, that is all it is.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman state a hypothetical case that would not apply to the Farm Loan Board anywhere?

Mr. BEGG. No. The Federal Farm Loan Board loans money on farming land free of any encumbrances at 50 per cent of its appraised value.

Mr. MANN. He stated it could loan more money than the land would sell for.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman misunderstood me. The hypothetical case I stated was that the Federal Farm Loan Board will loan 50 per cent of its value, and here is the added assessment against this property.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated a case of the Farm Loan Board loaning $1,000 on property that was worth only $1,000.

Mr. BEGG. I think the gentleman misunderstood me. I said a farm forced to sell for $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Now, the $1,000 is due, just as stated, for the water rights, but that is still on the land. If they loan without regard to that, they make an improvident loan.

Mr. BEGG. They can not loan except we, by our action, nullify the lien the Government holds for irrigation purposes. They can not make the loan to-day unless we nullify it so far as the loan applies.

Mr. MANN. That does not require them to make an improvident loan.

Mr. BEGG. Certainly not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's case lets them make an improvident loan.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask my colleague a question in line with the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I happen to know that the gentleman who has the floor is well posted on the farm loan situation. I happen to own a 40-acre farm in his district. It is worth about $6,000; and if I apply to the bank for $7,000 loan on it, who is going to lose the $1,000? It is a parallel case to the case stated by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to what the chairman of the Farm Loan Board, Mr. Lobdell, says on this proposition. He says that the farm is not free of a lien—he does not say whether it is free of an irrigation lien or not—he says, where the title reserves a specific lien for a specific amount, clearly the operator does not have such title as enables him to get a first mortgage. There is a charge against this land now for irrigation building. You are trying to nullify that first mortgage and still retain the Government's right. You are either playing in bad faith with the Government, or with the joint stock land bank, or the Federal farm loan bank. You can take your choice. You can not cancel it and still hold it.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman has read the last two lines of Mr. Lobdell's statement.

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman that I have read the whole thing.

Mr. SINNOTT. Then you will find that he makes the same statement as the gentleman from Illinois made, that he takes those things into consideration.

Mr. BEGG. He says, of course, if you nullify by legislative action the lien as a lien and change it into taxes, why then we can make the loan. But that is just exactly what I maintain. If you stultify yourself by canceling the loan that continues to be a lien and then make a loan against it and take it by the Government as a first mortgage, and sell it, you can do it, but I will not subscribe to anything of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is a surprise to me that a gentleman so intelligent as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] can get under such a misapprehension. The Government now has an individual lien on the property in irrigation districts, against the different pieces of property—a farm loan for construction charges.

The Farm Loan Board holds that that is such a lien that the man's mortgage upon the property does not convey a first lien upon his property. I have no disposition to quarrel with the construction of the Farm Loan Board. All over the country in various places people have organized drainage districts under the laws of the States. Those drainage districts are organized in such a way that the drainage district levies a special tax against the property which is benefited by the construction of the drainage work. That special assessment might be payable in one year, but I think it never is. It extends over a period of various numbers of years, 5, or 10, or 15 years. It is a first lien upon the property, with the taxes, just as much a first lien as the lien of the Federal Government upon the individual holding. But the Federal Farm Loan Board holds, and I think properly, that as that is a matter of taxes it is not considered as preventing a first mortgage upon the property being a first lien upon the property.

It may be just as high an assessment as the construction charges of the Government for the construction of irrigation works, and of course in either case the Federal Farm Loan Board takes into consideration, as any purchaser of the land would take into consideration, the fact that the land has an underlying claim against it for a certain amount that has given its present value to it, just like a street improvement that is not paid for on date. It may be paid for in a series of 10 years, and the owner of it may sell it to-morrow for a high price because of the street improvement. Unless he excepts the payment, if he gives a straight guaranty deed, the owner must pay the special assessments for the street improvement.

Now, here is a proposition merely to permit the irrigation districts to join together to relieve the Government lien upon an individual piece of ground here and another lien upon another individual piece of ground there, and to combine them so that all the pieces of ground shall be subject to a lien for the combined amount due, but that, when done, will not be considered as preventing a first mortgage upon the land being a first lien upon the land.

If the Federal Farm Loan Board had held that because taxes are a lien always a long time before they can be paid, it could not take a mortgage as a first lien because taxes were due on it, we would see that the ruling would be so ridiculous that nobody could do it. They could not have loaned a dollar. I am not quarreling with their decision. This is to relieve it. But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] said the whole thing is illegal; that because A owns plat A and B owns plat B A can not contract in any way to help pay the assessments against plat B, which is owned by B. But the first section of this bill contains this provision:

> No contract with an irrigation district under this act shall be binding on the United States until the proceedings on the part of the district for the authorization of the execution of the contract with the United States shall have been confirmed by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction or pending appellate action if ground for an appeal be laid.

Every man in the district has his rights. He can go into court when the question of confirming the authority is being disposed of by the court. But when the court has declared by decree that the district has the authority to make the contract it is res adjudicata. Nobody can raise the question after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman from Kansas says that in the case of proceedings which are null and void the question can be raised at any time. If the court enters a decree in such a proceeding, to which an individual is a party, and the court enters a decree against him, it makes no difference whether it was null and void or not; it is settled. He can not raise it except on appeal, and when the appeal is disposed of he can not raise it again.

Now, I can not see the purpose of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY]. I know the gentleman did not offer the amendment for the purpose of making uncertain the provisions of the bill, but I do not see what else his amendment does. There is nothing to assign. The gentleman talks of an assignment as collateral security. There is nothing to assign.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I offered the amendment, I will say, with all diffidence, because I had not studied the bill. But I will tell the gentleman what my idea is. The contract with the Secretary may well provide this, that as soon as the reclamation work shall have been completed and the assessments laid, thereupon the assessments shall be assigned to him, and the contract made shall be deemed to be the assignment of them when made, but the Secretary may demand a further assignment when they have actually been made.

Mr. MANN. They can not assign an assessment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why can not a man assign an assessment just as much as a mortgage? It is a lien, and a lien for a specific amount.

Mr. MANN. You mean the assignment made by the taxing body?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Surely.

Mr. MANN. They can not assign the assessment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why can they not assign the assessment? The assessment is a tax.

Mr. MANN. They can not assign the assessment. They certify to the taxing officers that a certain amount must be raised. They have it figured out. They can not assign the assessment. The assessment is put into collection. That is not assignable. The proceeds are already assigned by the contract.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But why can not the irrigation district, which is the owner of these liens, assign the liens? They are the lien, but the instant the legal process has been followed and completed the irrigation district is the owner of it.

Mr. MANN. The irrigation district is not the owner of anything. It is not the owner of a lien.

It is provided under the law with the power and the requirement that it shall levy an assessment for the collection of the money; that is all. It is an instrumentality for collecting the money which is a lien upon all the property in the district. But the very purpose of this bill is to relieve any question about there being an assessment against the property, except as there is an assessment levied each year by this taxing body, just as we levy taxes anywhere.

Mr. DEMPSEY. My understanding of it was that the only difference between this bill and the present system was that the lien became levied on the property in the one case just the same as in the other, but that the lien as it exists to-day is the property of the United States and the lien under this bill would be the property of the irrigation district.

Mr. MANN. If this bill goes through, we trade off a lien for a promise under a contract and a law which requires the lawful authority to levy a tax annually for the payment of the amount that is due; and they have to do that. Now, that is all they have to do, and if they do not do it we can sue the district for the amount due the Government and mandamus them and require them to do it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I was just going to suggest to the gentleman that I quite agree in that view. My amendment was offered under a misunderstanding, and I will withdraw it; but I quite agree with the gentleman that the remedy should not be by a simple suit but should be by mandamus to compel them to levy the tax.

Mr. MANN. I had thought of offering an amendment to this bill—but I am not going to do it, although I would not oppose it—giving the right to the Government directly to bring an action in a Federal court to mandamus the taxing authorities and require them to levy the tax. To be honest with you, we trade off a lien which we can collect by sale of the property for the right to compel the taxing body to levy a tax. Perhaps they will not do it and will go to jail instead; and if they do we will never get the money, but I am not much afraid of that. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. No; we need not be afraid of that.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I wish merely to answer the insinuation of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] regarding the possible deception that might be worked on the public in these farm loans should we pass this bill. Mr. Lobdell, of the Farm Loan Board, has taken into consideration these assessments, and he says, as is shown in the report on this bill, on page 5:

> In making the loan we feel that loans can be made, the question in this instance to consider being the effect of the assessment on the borrower's net earning power.

So they take all that into consideration when they make the loans on these irrigation projects.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Mr. Lobdell, commissioner and chairman of the Federal Farm Loan Board, wrote me a letter yesterday indorsing the provisions of this bill after having carefully examined the same. In a conversation over the phone he stated that in making the loan the amount that the water user has to pay or that the farm has to pay to the Government will be taken into consideration. In making these loans they will look into that very carefully in every case. I have mislaid the letter of Mr. Lobdell this afternoon; therefore I ask unanimous consent to insert the letter as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not the sense of this bill that it authorizes the Farm Loan Board to loan on a second mortgage by calling what was a lien a tax?

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, no.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is the effect of it.

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, no.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] may proceed out of order for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] may proceed out of order for seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read in my time a communication that I have received from the Senate of Porto Rico.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication indicated.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On February 25, 1922, the Senate of Porto Rico adopted the following resolution:

Resolution.

Whereas E. Montgomery Reily was appointed by the President of the United States to the office of Governor of Porto Rico, said appointment having been made under the provisions of the organic law known as the Jones Act;

Whereas immediately after said appointment and before he knew the country upon whose government he was about to enter, said E. Montgomery Reily expressed himself in the press of Kansas City, Mo., in a manner unbecoming a fair and even-minded man by making public statements in conflict with the dignity and rights of Porto Rico;

Whereas E. Montgomery Reily has shown that he lacks the most elementary qualifications of rectitude, tact, impartiality, and mental training required by the office held by him, as has been shown by his public and official acts in violation of the organic act of Porto Rico, such as the appointment of incompetent persons to public office, the corruption of the judiciary by threatening and removing judicial officers without just cause, and the attempted coercion of the liberty of the courts of justice;

Whereas said E. Montgomery Reily, on an official trip made by him over the island, acted as a vulgar agitator and in several speeches delivered by him expressed himself in the most insulting language against the Porto Rican flag, which is a symbol of local sentiment and as such is consecrated and respected by the entire Porto Rican community;

Whereas the conduct of E. Montgomery Reily in refusing to execute important laws of a financial nature, duly passed by the legislature and approved by the preceding chief executive, has created a chaotic condition in the public administration, greatly injuring the community and the credit of the island;

Whereas said E. Montgomery Reily has not only endeavored to corrupt and defame insular judicial officials but has also tried to exercise undue influence on the Federal administration of justice by publicly, personally, and notoriously seeking the modification of a sentence pronounced by the judge of the United States district court on an officer of the insular government for having committed contempt of court, thus weakening the moral support due by all citizens to the United States district court and to the magistrate presiding over said court;

Whereas, far from being a faithful interpreter of the law and an assurance of the constitutional rights granted to Porto Rico by the fundamental law approved by Congress, E. Montgomery Reily has become an irresponsible autocrat, ignoring and despising the Senate of Porto Rico in his appointments to the highest offices in the insular government, having sought in his purpose the sole advice of members of the minority, in detriment and mockery of the rights of the legitimate representatives of the greater part of public opinion;

Whereas the conduct of E. Montgomery Reily prior to his appointment as representative of the national sovereignty in Porto Rico has been incorrect and immoral to such a degree as to deprive him of the prestige and authority indispensable in the chief executive of a community of American citizens jealous of their culture and high civilization;

Whereas the continuance of said E. Montgomery Reily at the head of the insular government is an offense against the decorum and dignity of the people of Porto Rico, and determines a state of insecurity and distrust throughout the whole of Porto Rican society: Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Senate of Porto Rico, First. Solemnly to accuse E. Montgomery Reily before the Congress of the United States of having violated the organic act and other statutes of Porto Rico and of having done everything possible to discredit in Porto Rico the great Nation which is the cradle of liberty and democracy, by action, not as a true representative of the United States of America but as a vulgar agitator and an irresponsible despot.

Second. To request the United States Congress to direct a number of Members thereof to make an investigation of the conditions brought about in the administration and society of Porto Rico by E. Montgomery Reily.

Third. To request the President of the United States of America to remove E. Montgomery Reily from the office of Governor of Porto Rico for the good of the island and to vindicate the prestige and good name of the United States as assailed by their representative in Porto Rico.

Given under my hand at San Juan, P. R., this 28th day of February, A. D. 1922.

[SEAL.]

JOSÉ MUÑOZ QUEBA,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, this resolution was adopted by the Senate of Porto Rico by a vote of 15 to 3. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I have complete confidence in the spirit of justice of the national administration as I also have in the justice of our cause.

Whoever knows the views of the President of the United States about the Latin American people, and the West Indies in particular, must agree that the President of our Nation will not tolerate in Porto Rico identical conditions to those criticized by him when he was making his plea for the suffrages of the American electorate.

The President in a speech at Marion, Ohio, on August 28, 1920, said:

So many things have been done by the present expiring administration that no power on earth could induce me to do that I can not even attempt to recount them. I may remark casually, however, that if I should be, as I fully expect to be, elected President of this just and honorable Republic, I will not empower an Assistant Secretary of the Navy to draft a constitution for helpless neighbors in the West Indies and jam it down their throats at the point of bayonets borne by United States marines. We have a higher service for our gallant marines than that. Nor will I misuse the power of the Executive to cover with a veil of secrecy repeated acts of unwarranted interference in domestic affairs of the little republics of the Western Hemisphere, such as in the last few years have not only made enemies of those who should be our friends but have rightfully discredited our country as their trusted neighbor.

I can not allow to go unchallenged the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] when he stated that Gov. Reily hoisted the American flag over the schools of Porto Rico over the protests of the people whom I said he removed from office. When the gentleman made this statement I arose and said: "I deny that most emphatically. The gentleman is entirely incorrect." As the gentleman did not yield to me when I denied his assertion, he struck out my remarks from the RECORD. I want to repeat again that the information received by the gentleman is entirely false. The Governor of Porto Rico has never hoisted American flags over schools or elsewhere over the protests of the loyal people of the island. It is very easy to speak about loyalty in times of peace while it is very difficult to prove loyalty in times of war. The record of Porto Rico during the recent world crisis speaks for itself and is second to none. No State of the Union can exhibit a better record than ours. The majority party, this party criticized by Gov. Reily and totally disregarded by him, immediately after the declaration of the war sent a cable to President Wilson which reads as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., May 9, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
Washington, D. C.

The Unionist Party of Porto Rico, gathered in an assembly at San Juan, pledges its unconditional support to the American Nation and to its illustrious President in the present conflict, and expects that Porto Rico be assigned its share of sufferings and sacrifices until victory is obtained.

ANTONIO R. BARCELÓ,
President of the Senate.

At the very time that this cable message was dispatched, Manuel F. Rossy, president of the Republican Party which now supports Gov. Reily, was being quoted in the San Juan Tiempo as saying:

If our countryman (jíbaro) goes to France, he does so not through his own volition, but because he is sent by law and by the national will.

During the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] made the statement that E. Mont Reily on his return to Porto Rico received a tremendous reception at the hands of the common people. It is true that the governor was received by his friends, the Socialists and the Republicans, to the number of about 3,000 people, more or less, but I want to state that I have reliable information that when the commission that came to Washington to protest against Reily returned home it received a tremendous reception by nearly 40,000 people. It is very easy to get a crowd such as welcomed the governor at any time, but it is impossible to obtain the love and affection of a people by oppression and force.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by him may be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] be withdrawn. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That patents and water-right certificates which shall hereafter be issued under the terms of the act entitled "An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1912 (37th Stats. L., p. 265), for lands lying within any irrigation district with which the United States shall have contracted, by which the irrigation district agrees to make the payment of all charges for the building of irrigation works and for operation and maintenance, shall not reserve to the United States a lien for the payment of such charges; and where such a lien shall have been reserved in any patent or water-right certificate issued under the said act of Congress, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered to release such lien in such manner and form as may be deemed effective; and the Secretary of the Interior is further empowered to release liens in favor of the United States contained in water-right applications and to assent to the release of liens to secure reimbursement of moneys due to the United States pursuant to water-right applications running in favor of the water users' association and contained in stock subscription contracts to such associations, when the lands covered by such liens shall be subject to assessment and levy for the collection of all moneys due and to become due to the United States by irrigation districts formed pursuant to State law and with which the United States shall have entered into contract therefor: Provided, That no lien reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate heretofore and hereafter issued under the reclamation law shall be released unless and until the patentee or water-right applicant shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection of such tax by and through such irrigation district for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation: Provided, further, That before any lien is released as provided in this act the Secretary of the Interior shall first favorably find and file a report in writing, which shall show that the irrigation district is legally formed and organized under the State law in which the irrigation district is situated, with full power to enter into such contract with the United States; and full power and authority to collect by assessment and levying all of the money then due, or to become due, and payable to the United States, by the irrigation district on all valid and now effective contracts and obligations by and from all water users holding land or entries within the district due the United States; and that the lands should be subject to assessment and levy, in accordance with the law under which the irrigation district is organized, for the collection of all money due the United States.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, line 6, strike out lines 6 to 25, inclusive, and page 5, strike out lines 1 and 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That no such lien so reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate shall be released until the owner of the land covered by the lien shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection by such irrigation district of taxes against said land for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation.

"Provided further, That before any lien is released under this act the Secretary of the Interior shall file a written report finding that the contracting irrigation district is legally organized under the laws of the State in which its lands are located with full power to enter into the contract and to collect by assessment and levy against the lands of the district the amount of the contract obligation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, in considering this question it occurs to me that this district is in the same position as the municipality where all improvements, water, streets, sidewalks, sewers, or what not, are assessed against the abutting property. Bonds are issued and the whole municipality is obligated to pay these bonds. The district composing these water takers could issue bonds if they cared to and assess each individual owner according to the benefit he received. But in this case, as I understand it, the Government is furnishing the money and taking a mortgage upon each individual property, and now the question is, shall the Government release this lien and place the obligation upon the whole municipality or corporation or district. In this case each particular property will be assessed according to its valuation, according to its benefits. If there is property that has already paid its assessments it will be relieved from any further assessments. The assessments will be placed against each particular piece of property and collected in installments—perhaps in 5 or 10 years, I do not know, but under whatever arrangement they may make. These assessments would be the same kind of a lien against the property as ordinary taxes. Therefore, answering the question of the gentleman from Ohio about this lien or assessment, the person who would loan money on a first mortgage would take into consideration any taxes or any assessments upon the property. They would probably subtract the amount of the assessment that would be due, payable in 10 years, from the valuation in establishing a valuation of the property with the lien upon it. So, I do not believe the argument of the gentleman from Ohio is very logical in regard to the matter of making loans.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand this bill, it proposes to give to the man that has a lien on his property for getting water on it the same treatment and the same rights that a man now has who has a lien on his property in an effort to get water off it. That is, treat irrigation and drainage districts exactly the same.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is the understanding that I have of this particular measure, but I was just following out the position that it would place the district in in collecting the assessments, and I believe that the assessments should be collected, and the district itself would collect these assessments, and as a whole would be responsible to the Government. The Government would be in a position to collect this debt just the same as any bondholder of any municipality. You would be able to collect this debt by using the same means that creditors of any particular municipality in this country would use.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that Cincinnati has authority to pay off the liens on the gentleman's property?

Mr. STEPHENS. Cincinnati has not the authority to pay the mortgages on the property, but it has authority to collect any assessments.

Mr. LITTLE. Or pay any lien that the Government might hold upon it?

Mr. STEPHENS. Cincinnati has not the authority to pay your mortgages.

Mr. LITTLE. Suppose the Government of the United States had a lien on the gentleman's property, could the city pay it for him?

Mr. STEPHENS. I think not. It may be, according to what kind of lien the Government would have.

Mr. LITTLE. I think the gentleman must know that Cincinnati could not undertake to pay the United States any debt that he owed it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I know this: That in making assessments, if the whole district is to assume the assessments, it will be placed in the same position as the municipality that collects assessments for improvements in that municipality.

Mr. LITTLE. The difficulty with that is that there is no relation whatever between the assessment the gentleman speaks of and the debts which an individual owes the Government of the United States. The two have no relation to each other and there is no similarity.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have not the time to discuss that part of it.

Mr. LITTLE. But that is all there is of this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, would an automatic roll call come now if the point of no quorum be made without a division?

The SPEAKER. That is a point which the Chair has never settled.

Mr. MANN. I think it is clear under the rules that it would.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would come.

Mr. LITTLE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall not ask for a division, but I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 287, nays 10, answered "present" 3, not voting 129, as follows:

FRANK D. SCOTT.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. It will be my own remarks, supplemented by some notations from the Supreme Court.

Mr. MANN. Oh, this is his bill, and he did not speak on it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to present my views on this legislation. Being a member of the committee, I shall use the language of the report on the bill by the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in presenting it to the House. This shows quite clearly the objects and purposes of the proposed legislation, and I take this opportunity to make the same of record so the question may be clearly and distinctly understood in its further consideration.

The enactment of this legislation will accomplish two beneficial effects.

First. The United States will have better security for the money expended in the construction of reclamation projects. Instead of the individual obligation of the water users, the Government will have the obligations of legally organized irrigation districts, being municipal corporations possessing the power to assess and collect taxes on all of the lands within the district.

Second. The landowners within such irrigation projects will be enabled to obtain loans from the Federal farm loan system.

The primary object of bill H. R. 4382 is to pave the way for farm loans on irrigation projects without subordinating security for the reimbursement of the reclamation fund or interfering with the Government's present security contained in the guaranty contract with individual water users' associations.

The committee in considering this bill and reporting it to the House did so with the idea in view that it will give much relief financially to those engaged in production of foodstuffs throughout the country under irrigation projects. No enterprise in which the Government may be considered a silent partner makes such bounteous returns as the irrigation projects fostered and protected by Government aid. At the same time the aid rendered is an advancement only to enable the worker of irrigated soil to bring to his assistance the necessary implements and tools to accomplish greater results.

The purpose of this bill is to enable the owners, entrymen, and occupants of lands under Government constructed and operated irrigation projects to form irrigation districts under the State law of the State wherein the irrigated lands are located, and when formed in accordance with the State law they shall be recognized as a public corporation, and as such be empowered to make application for and receive funds from Federal farm loan banks as owners of farms in the nonirrigated sections of the United States may do and are now doing. Taxes for the payment of the contractual obligations of the district may be assessed, levied, and collected against the acreage of the district and is not chargeable by the Government to any individual within the confines thereof. And any lien the Government may have for moneys expended in the procuring of water for the acreage in the district to the individual owner of lands under such ditch or works constructed by the Government is released and passes by virtue of this act to the district body as a whole and is cared for by district assessment and levy, which assessment so levied is chargeable and recovered against the land of the individual owner as debtor. In other words, the Federal Government is dealing with the irrigation district instead of the individual owner or water users' association.

The formation of irrigation districts is entirely voluntary with the water users. These corporations are uniformly held to be public corporations and are susceptible of being formed under the State laws only upon a vote of such majority of landowners as may be prescribed by the statute. There is nothing in the bill which enjoins upon the water users reorganizing as districts, but the bill is in effect an enabling act whereby cooperation can be carried on by the United States in a more perfect manner than heretofore.

The formation of an irrigation district, while it is a step of great importance, being from a private corporation to a municipality, yet in several respects is not so radical a change as might be supposed. There is nothing in the formation of the irrigation district which necessitates the transfer from the Government of the operation and management of the project. There is no implied repeal of the provisions of the present reclamation law—

That when the payments required by this act are made for the major portion of the lands irrigated from the waters of any of the works herein provided for, then the management and operation of such irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby * * *. (Reclamation act, sec. 6, 38 Stat., 388.)

Nor of the amendatory provision—

That whenever any legally organized water users' association or irrigation district shall so request, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to transfer to such water users' association or irrigation district the care, operation, and maintenance of all or any part of the project works, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. (Reclamation extension act, Aug. 13, 1914, sec. 4, 38 Stat., 686.)

The passage of this act followed by organization as an irrigation district does not involve the turning over to the water users of management and control unless the Secretary of the Interior approves such step and the water users vote favorably upon the plan, at least prior to the payment for the major part of the land irrigated under the project as provided by the original reclamation act. It would, however, facilitate the transfer if both the water users and the Government deemed the change advisable, since municipal powers would greatly aid in the solution of the problems of management and control.

The formation of the irrigation district would not involve the issuance of bonds in favor of the United States nor the payment of interest. The projects would still have the advantages of the reimbursement plan prescribed by sections 1 and 2 of the reclamation extension act above quoted in mutual cooperation with the United States.

This cooperation can best be conducted so as to make as little change as possible in the ordinary machinery of these corporations under the State statutes. The funds of the district are secured by levy and assessment in common with the methods of other municipal corporations formed for the purpose of public improvement. Hence it is highly desirable that the Federal law be in such shape that the machinery for the collection of assessments to carry out the contracts with the United States shall be identical with that employed to secure other funds or irrigation districts.

Express authority of Congress therefore is conferred by section 1 of the bill to contract with irrigation districts for the payment of moneys required to reimburse the reclamation fund, with provision that in such cases water-right applications need not be filed and that the dates of annual payment of penalties and interest charges named in the contract shall be discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior.

In case irrigation district contract is made with the United States, the security furnished for the reimbursement of the reclamation fund is preferable, both in value and in workability, to the security through the water users' association, and where such contract is made water-right application liens are no longer necessary to the United States, and section 1 expressly provides for their release. The water users' association, of course, is replaced by the irrigation district, and accordingly may properly be dissolved through the Secretary's consent and the stock subscription liens released of record.

This step will pave the way for affording the farm loans to reclamation projects which elect thus to reorganize as districts, since there will be no first mortgage on project lands for the reimbursement to the United States. The moneys due from irrigation districts are not first mortgages any more than the assessment to be made for road or school purposes by similar public corporations. They become liens only annually as assessment and levy is made. Under the farm loan act the money payable to the district for the United States must, of course, be considered and have its bearing upon the amount which may properly be loaned, but the legal barrier as regards the existence of first mortgages will be removed by the formation of an irrigation district, the execution of contract with the United States by such district, and the release of the liens on private lands now existing to secure the Government.

The act of August 9, 1912, requires that patents to lands entered subject to the reclamation law shall reserve a lien in favor of the United States for any sums remaining unpaid. Similar liens are reserved where final water-right certificate is issued. Where irrigation districts are formed this type of security is no longer necessary, since the irrigation district as a whole can be required to pay, and all lands therein are subject to sale for nonpayment of charges.

The Farm Loan Board has already rendered an opinion, and Judge Lobdell of the board appeared before the committee in recognition of the distinction between the lien reserved under the act of 1912, the lien created by water-right application and by stock subscription, on the one hand, as constituting first mortgages, and the assessments of districts annually becoming a lien, on the other hand, as not constituting first mortgages, but, rather, to be classed with the taxes and improvement assessments of public corporations. In the first class the farm loans are held barred, while in the other they are permissible.

The Federal Farm Loan Board's opinion is as follows:

> Board unanimously of the opinion loans can not be made on lands under reclamation projects where Government reserves lien in patent and such lien remains unsatisfied. We distinguish between above cases and those projects where irrigation charge is a fixed annual assessment and collected as taxes, a complete title being in borrower. * * * Where the water assessment is merely a fixed annual charge collectible as taxes and the borrower's legal title is unimpaired, we feel that loans can be made, the question in this instance to consider being the effect of the assessment on the borrower's net earning power. Where the title reserves a specific lien for a specific amount, clearly the borrower does not have such title as enables him to give a first mortgage, construing the term "first mortgage," as we must, to mean a paramount lien.

The result of the act, therefore, would be to encourage the formation of irrigation districts and provide cooperation therewith, to release the liens now constituting present or prospective encumbrances on both private land and the entered lands within all projects reorganized as irrigation districts when the district itself made contract for the repayment of the charges, thus facilitating farm loans.

The irrigation district is by no means an experiment, but the principles applicable have been thoroughly thrashed out in the State courts of the West and in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The irrigation district statutes apply to the public work of reclaiming arid lands the principles applicable to public corporations. These laws have been upheld by the courts of last resort in practically all reclamation States. The Supreme Court of the United States has upheld the constitutionality of the California law, which is entirely typical, in the case of Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (164 U. S., 112). The courts have upheld the power of these districts to assess and levy for construction purposes with entire uniformity. After an irrigation district is once organized as a de facto corporation, it has been held that no one but the State can question its organization. (Tulare Irrigation District v. Shepard, 185 U. S., 1.)

The various irrigation district laws contain confirmation provisions whereby an obligation, before being incurred by the issuance of bonds or by contracts to reimburse the reclamation fund of the United States, can be judicially passed upon and approved. Upon the successful determination of such proceedings the decree is binding upon the world under the decisions of all State courts. It has been held in California that even the State is bound by the confirmation decree (People v. Linda Vista Irrigation District, 128 Calif., 477, 61 Pac., 86.)

The Secretary of the Interior had the following to say in support of the proposed legislation:

> The purpose of the bill is to adjust certain procedure relating to cooperation between the United States and irrigation districts organized under State laws in connection with contracts providing for the repayment of water charges upon Federal irrigation projects.
>
> The use of the irrigation-district plan of securing repayments of water charges on Federal irrigation projects has been approved in a general way by Congress for the past 10 years. The Warren Act of February 24, 1911 (36 Stat., 925), provides for contracts with irrigation districts, and the extension act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat., 686), at section 5 authorizes the transfer of the care, operation, and maintenance of Federal irrigation projects to irrigation districts. In section 7 of the last-named act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint irrigation districts as fiscal agents on Government projects. In the Smith Act of August 11, 1916 (39 Stat., 506), public lands of the United States were made subject to the assessment and levy of irrigation districts. The sundry civil appropriation act of June 12, 1917 (40 Stat., 148), provides that no moneys shall be expended for drainage on the Rio Grande project except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of all project investments. A similar provision appears in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 1, 1918 (40 Stat., 674), and in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 19, 1919 (41 Stat., 200). In the act of July 1, 1918, Congress specifically approved an agreement by which a developed Carey Act project in Idaho, which had been organized into an irrigation district, known as the King Hill irrigation district, contracted with the United States for the further development of the project and for repayment to the United States under the irrigation-district plan. The sundry civil appropriation act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat., 913), approves a further agreement with the King Hill irrigation district and also provides that no part of the appropriation made for the Boise Federal irrigation project in Idaho shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of the cost thereof. All of this legislation is general in nature and contains no specific amendment to the details of existing procedure designed to apply to dealings with individual water-right applicants.
> A general rule upon Federal irrigation projects is to require each person applying for a right to the use of water to file a formal water-right application. This procedure, however, is inconsistent with the irrigation-district plan for the reason that in the latter case the water right vests in the irrigation district, which is a quasi public corporation, and the individual water user has no separable water right, being entitled by the laws of the State to his proportionate share of the water available for the district. Accordingly, the requirement of a water-right application in a case where a contract has been made with an irrigation district compels an unnecessary amount of work and possible complications. The first section of this bill would eliminate the requirement of water-right applications where contract for repayment of water charges has been made with an irrigation district. It also would modify the requirements of the extension act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat., 686), relating to dates and conditions of payment so as to comply with the provisions of State laws in regard to the collection of taxes to provide funds for making payments upon water rights.
> The act of August 9, 1912 (37 Stat., 265), reserves a lien to the United States in certain patents and water-right certificates issued prior to full payment of water-right charges. This lien can not be released except upon full payment of the construction charges. When a contract has been made with an irrigation district providing for payment of all water charges, the United States then has ample security for the collection of such charges, and the lien reserved by the act of August 9, 1912, is no longer necessary. In such cases it is advisable to release the lien so the farmers may be able to secure loans either from the Federal Farm Loan Board or from other loan agencies which consider this lien a first mortgage and will therefore not make loans upon lands subject thereto. The liens of assessments made by irrigation districts to provide money for payment of Government water charges are of the same general nature as assessments made by towns, counties, and school districts, and are not regarded as obstacles to the making of loans.

Section 2 of the bill would authorize the Secretary of the Interior, in a case where contract has been made with an irrigation district providing for payment of all Government water charges, to release the liens under the act of August 9, 1912, as to lands within such irrigation district, and would also do away with those liens in the future as to such lands. This section would also authorize for the same reason the release of liens which arise under our water-right applications. These liens, however, are provided by regulation and not by law, and it would therefore seem that the Secretary now has the authority to make such releases. There is no objection, though, to having this provision included in the bill.

It is suggested that the intent of the first proviso of section 2 of the bill would possibly be more clearly expressed in the following form:

"Provided, That no such lien so reserved to the United States in any patent or water-right certificate shall be released until the owner of the land covered by the lien shall consent in writing to the assessment, levy, and collection by such irrigation district of taxes against said land for the payment to the United States of the contract obligation."

The second proviso of section 2 is apparently surplusage, as the matter therein referred to seems to be fully covered by the provision for judicial confirmation in section 1. If, however, your committee desires to retain the second proviso of section 2, the following form is suggested:

"Provided further, That before any lien is released under this act the Secretary of the Interior shall file a written report finding that the contracting irrigation district is legally organized under the laws of the State in which its lands are located, with full power to enter into the contract and to collect by assessment and levy against the lands of the district the amount of the contract obligation."

The act of August 11, 1916 (39 Stat., 506), provides for the taxation of public lands within irrigation districts under certain conditions. This law requires the filing with the Department of the Interior of a map or plan showing the irrigation system. This procedure seems unnecessary in cases where a contract has been made between the United States and an irrigation district under which the Government becomes the builder of the irrigation system, and section 3 of the bill proposes to eliminate the requirement of filing such a map.

I am of the opinion that it would be advisable to amend the bill as herein suggested, and that it should then be enacted into law.

The general advantages of this proposed legislation may be briefly stated as follows:

1. The organization, financing, and operation of irrigation districts are fully under popular control.

2. This increases the sense of local civic responsibility.

3. The projects are much more rapidly organized by the holding of an election after a petition for organization than is possible where individual contracts from the landowners must be secured.

4. Examination of abstracts of title is of no importance under the district plan.

5. Complete control over the lands of the dissenting minority is secured so that all of the lands benefited are bound.

6. No profit other than interest on the bonds is paid to the creditors or for promotion.

7. The method of public assessment is applied to all lands benefited, affording priority over private mortgage liens and the same machinery for collection as in the case of taxes.

8. The collection of the needed funds by public assessment results in a better attitude on the part of the average landowner toward the payment of the moneys required for irrigation.

9. Control is secured over public lands of the United States when entered and against unentered lands awaiting entry assessments accumulate.

10. The status of a public corporation gives the irrigation district a much better standing in financial markets.

11. The State district laws supply the best means for cooperation with the United States under Federal reclamation laws.

12. Several States provide for exemption of taxation of irrigation-district property and others for the registration of bonds so that they become lawful securities for the investment of State school funds and for private fiduciary moneys.

13. The laws of all States provide for confirmation proceedings, jurisdiction over all persons being secured by publication, whereby the decree becomes conclusive upon all the world as to the organization of the district and the validity of the debts incurred.

14. The speculative feature is eliminated, landowners speculatively inclined, being taxed for the cost and operation of the works, are unable profitably to "hold on."

15. The land is accordingly early put into cultivation in order to make it possible to meet the assessments.

16. The project in this manner is more rapidly developed and achieves more prompt success.

17. Where irrigation districts are formed and assume the indebtedness to private creditors or the United States, the liens for construction costs, etc., may be discharged as regards private lands. Then, after the district makes the necessary collections by assessment and levy, as in the case of other municipal corporations, and the only lien required is that which comes into existence annually for the current assessment, such an obligation and lien are not in any sense a legal bar to the enjoyment of the privileges of the Federal farm loan act.

This bill is similar and practically the same as H. R. 2702, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, upon which the committee made unanimous report on May 29, 1920, being Report No. 1065 of said Sixty-sixth Congress. Full hearings were had on said bill H. R. 2702, which, together with Report No. 1065 and such hearings theretofore had by the committee, were before and considered by the committee in consideration of H. R. 4382 and in making their report thereon to the House.

Any Member of the House desiring to familiarize himself with the irrigation laws of the 17 Western States and decisions of the various courts of such States and the Supreme Court of the United States thereon, together with the Federal reclamation laws of the United States, will be able to find the same in two publications published by the direction of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands entitled:

(1) Compilation of the Irrigation District Laws of the Seventeen Western States of the United States, January 1, 1920.

(2) Federal Reclamation Laws of the United States (annotated), a chronological compilation of the public statutes of the United States relating to Federal irrigation of arid lands, with notes of decisions of the courts, the comptroller, the Attorney General, the Department of the Interior, and Reclamation Service, by Ottamar Hamele, counsel, United States Reclamation Service, January 1, 1920.

Much discussion was had during this debate on the question of whether irrigation districts were for "public purposes" or for "private enterprises."

In addition to the cases above cited, I desire to present the following:

(Judson on taxation. Second edition, sec. 380.)

SUPREME COURT ON LOAN ASSOCIATION V. TOPEKA.

In the California irrigation case (Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S., 112) the Supreme Court of California had adjudged that the purpose of the assessment was public. But it was contended that the United States Supreme Court was not concluded by this and had the power "under general constitutional law" to determine whether the purpose was public or private. The court held, however, that it could only review the decision of the State court on this question to determine whether the assessment was valid under the fourteenth amendment, and that it could not overrule the State court on principles of general constitutional law, saying, at page 155:

"We should not be justified in holding the act to be in violation of the State constitution in the face of clear and repeated decisions of the highest court of the State to the contrary under the pretext that we were deciding principles of general constitutional law. If the act violates any provision, expressed or properly implied, of the Federal Constitution, it is our duty to so declare it; but if it do not, there is no justification for the Federal courts to run counter to the decisions of the highest State court upon questions involving the construction of State statutes or constitutions on any alleged ground that such decisions are in conflict with sound principles of general constitutional law. The contrary has not been held in this court by the case of Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655). In that case a statute of Kansas was held invalid because by its provisions the property of the citizen, under the guise of taxation, would be taken in aid of a private enterprise, which was a perversion of the power of taxation. The case was brought in the United States Circuit Court for the District of Kansas and was decided by that court in favor of the city. There had been no decision of the highest State court upon the question whether the act violated the constitution of Kansas, and consequently there was none to be followed by the Federal court upon that question. This court held that a law taxing the citizen for the use of a private enterprise conducted by other citizens was an unauthorized invasion of private rights. Mr. Justice Miller said that there were such rights in every free government which were beyond the control of the State. The ground of the decision was, as stated, that the act took the property of the citizen for a private purpose, although under the forms of taxation. In thus holding there was no overruling or refusing to follow the decisions of the highest court of the State respecting the constitution of its own State.

"We are, therefore, practically confined in this case to the inquiry whether the act in question, as it has been construed by the State courts, violates the Federal Constitution."

It was held that the assessment was for a public purpose sufficient to constitute due process of law.

(Limitations of taxing power and public indebtedness. By James M. Gray. Section 248.)

TAXATION FOR DRAINAGE, IRRIGATION, LEVEES, AND DIKES.

The enforcement of such sanitary regulations and the employment of such sanitary methods as are necessary or conducive to the general health of the community are public purposes which are justifiable under the police power of the State, and the power of taxation may properly be used in furtherance of such purposes. The danger to the public health and the public inconvenience which arise from wet lands, marshes, ponds, and swamps are well known; consequently the drainage of such lands, marshes, and swamps is of public utility, and taxes or special assessments may be levied to perform such work.

(Limitations of taxing power and public indebtedness. By James M. Gray. Section 253.)

TAXATION FOR DRAINAGE, IRRIGATION, LEVEES, AND DIKES.

The principles which justify the drainage of swamp lands justify also the irrigation of arid lands, although the public benefit is not so much a matter of health as of profit. If it be essential or material to the prosperity of the community, the lands may be irrigated at the public expense; and if the improvement be one in which all the landowners of a district have to a certain extent a common interest, it may be made at their joint expense by way of special assessment; and the questions of the public utility and the common benefit are both generally within the discretion of the legislature. It is settled that "the irrigation of really arid lands is a public purpose, and the water thus used is put to a public use." (Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S., 112; 41 L. ed., 369; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep., 56. Tregea v. Modesto Irrigation District, 164 U. S., 179; 41 L. ed., 395; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep., 52. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Calif., 296; 27 Am. St. Rep., 106; 28 Pac. Rep., 272, 675; 14 L. R. A., 755. Ellinghouse v. Taylor, 19 Mont., 462; 48 Pac. Rep., 757. Prescott Irrigation Co. v. Flathers, 20 Wash., 454; 55 Pac. Rep., 635. Cummings v. Hyatt, 54 Nebr., 35; 74 N. W. Rep., 411.)

The United States Supreme Court, in Jones v. Portland (245 U. S., p. 217), speaking on this question, says:

Municipal taxation to raise the money necessary to enable the municipality to establish and maintain a permanent coal and fuel yard for the purpose of selling wood, coal, and fuel to its inhabitants without financial profit, conformably to State legislation purporting to be passed in the public interest, and so declared to be by the highest court of the State, can not be said to deny the taxpayers the protection which the constitutional guaranty of due process of law affords against the taking of their property for uses that are private. (For other cases see Constitutional Law, 445–449; Eminent Domain, 39–58, in Digest Sup. Ct., 1908.)

The contention is that the establishment of the municipal wood yard is not a public purpose; that taxation to accomplish that end amounts to the taking of the property of the plaintiffs in error without due process of law.

The decision of the case turns upon the answer to the question whether the taxation is for a public purpose. It is well settled that moneys for other than public purposes can not be raised by taxation, and that exertion of the taxing power for merely private purposes is beyond the authority of the State. (Citizens' Sav. & L. Assoc. v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655; 22 L. ed., 455.)

The act in question has the sanction of the legislative branch of the State government, the body primarily invested with authority to determine what laws are required in the public interest. That the purpose is a public one has been determined upon full consideration by the supreme judicial court of the State, upon the authority of a previous decision of that court. (Laughlin v. Portland, 111 Me., 486; 51 L. R. A. (N. S.), 1143; 90 Atl., 318; Ann. Cas. 1916C, 734.)

The attitude of this court toward State legislation purporting to be passed in the public interest, and so declared to be by the decision of the court of last resort of the State passing the act, has often been declared. While the ultimate authority to determine the validity of legislation under the fourteenth amendment is rested in this court, local conditions are of such varying character that what is or is not a public use in a particular State is manifestly a matter respecting which local authority, legislative and judicial, has peculiar facilities for securing accurate information. In that view the judgment of the highest court of the State upon what should be deemed a public use in a particular State is entitled to the highest respect. (Hairston v. Danville & W. R. Co., 208 U. S., 598, 607; 52 L. ed., 637, 641; 29 Sup. Ct. Rep., 331; 13 Ann. Cas., 1008.) In Union Line Co. v. (222) Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 233 U. S., 211; 58 L. ed., 924; 34 Sup. Ct. Rep., 522, this court declared that a decision of the highest court of the State declaring a use to be public in its nature would be accepted unless clearly not well founded, citing Fallbrook Irrig. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S., 112, 160; 41 L. ed., 369, 389; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep., 56; Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S., 361, 369; 49 L. ed., 1085, 1088; 25 Sup. Ct. Rep., 676; 4 Ann. Cas., 1171; Strickley v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co., 200 U. S., 527, 531; 50 L. ed., 581, 583; 26 Sup. Ct. Rep., 301; 4 Ann. Cas., 1174; Offield v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 203 U. S., 372, 377; 51 L. ed., 231, 236; 27 Sup. Ct. Rep., 72; Hairston v. Danville & W. R. Co., supra. This doctrine was reiterated in O'Neill v. Leamer, 239 U. S., 244, 253; 60 L. ed., 249, 265; 36 Sup. Ct. Rep., 54.

(5, 6) 2. This presumption in favor of laws imposing taxes is, as Judge Cooley says in his work on Taxation (3d ed., p. 185), "applicable with peculiar force to the case of a legislative decision upon the purpose for which a tax may be laid. For in the first place there is no such thing as drawing a clear and definite line of distinction between purposes of a public and those of a private nature. Public and private interests are so commingled in many cases that it is difficult to determine which predominates; and the question whether the public interest is so distinct and clear as to justify taxation is found embarrassing to the legislature and no less so to the judiciary. * * * To justify the court in declaring the tax void, the absence of all possible public interest in the purpose for which the funds are raised must be clear and palpable—so clear and palpable as to be perceivable by every mind at first blush."

3. "Limitations or restrictions upon the exercise of this essential power of sovereignty can never be raised by implication, but the intention to impose them must be expressed in clear and unambiguous language." (Cooley on Taxation, p. 177.) What constitutes a public purpose will vary in different communities and different periods. (Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S., 112; 117 Supt. Ct., 56; 41 L. Ed., 369; Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S., 362; 25 Sup. Ct., 676; 49 L. Ed., 1085; 4 Ann. Cas., 1171; O'Neill v. Leamer, 239 U. S., 244, 253; 36 Sup. Ct., 54; 60 L. Ed., 249; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S., 104; 31 Sup. Ct., 186; 55 L. Ed., 112; 32 L. R. A. (N. S.), 1062; Ann. Cas., 1912A, 487.)

4. The fourteenth amendment contains no express language limiting the taxing power of States. Laws have been condemned by holding that a tax for a purely private purpose deprives the taxpayer of his property without due process of law. When is a tax for a "purely private purpose" within this rule?

(a) The only cases in the Federal courts in which laws have been condemned are those in which bonds or public funds were given as a mere gratuity to a privately owned manufacturing enterprise to encourage its establishment within the city. Such are the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff. (Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655; 22 L. Ed., 455; City of Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S., 487; 1 Sup. Ct. 442; 27 L. Ed., 238; Cole v. City of La Grange, 113 U. S., 1; 5 Sup. Ct., 416; 28 L. Ed., 896; Dodge v. Mission Township, 107 Fed., 827; 46 C. C. A., 661; 54 L. R. A., 242.)

(b) I have not been able to discover any instance in which the Supreme Court has held invalid an exercise of the taxing power of the State for establishing and maintaining an industry which was owned by the State or a municipality. Such is the character of all the laws here asailed. The industries are to be owned by the State or cities. The latest expression of the Supreme Court on the subject is Jones v. City of Portland (245 U. S., 217; 38 Sup. Ct., 112; 62 L. Ed., 252; L. R. A., 1918C, 765; Ann. Cas., 1918E, 650), sustaining a statute of the State of Maine authorizing cities to establish and maintain wood, coal, and fuel yards for the purpose of selling at cost wood, coal, and fuel to their inhabitants. This decision is the more impressive because a similar law has been held invalid by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts and by some other State courts. (Scott v. Frazier, 258 Fed., 669–675, 676.)

In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Kansas as to the objector or minority, the following might be quoted:

Whatever damages the plaintiffs in this case may suffer, they will suffer as members of the democratic family associated as the government of the State. I know of no way a citizen in a democracy can be relieved of his share of the burden incident to the character of the Government, and as a matter of reciprocity it may be noted that all the blessings of a democratic Government are thrust upon an unassenting minority. (Green v. Frazier, 176 N. W., 24.)

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Our gracious Father, Thou hast been very indulgent in Thy mercies toward us. We rejoice this morning that Thou art the same loving, tender-hearted, gracious God. Multiply Thy mercies unto us, we humbly beseech Thee.

Grant Thy blessing to all in authority. May the President be under Thy gracious keeping at this time; and so manifest Thyself to each one in the deliberations of this day that great mercy and peace may be multiplied. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 9, 1922.

UNIFORM FOR AMBASSADORS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on the 7th instant there appeared an editorial in the Chicago Tribune, a great western Republican newspaper, which I desire to have read at the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

UNIFORMS FOR AMBASSADORS.

The English who saw Ambassador Harvey in his knee breeches and with his sword at the wedding of Princess Mary seem to agree that he was funny. His countrymen at home are afraid he must have been. They are glad he did not trip on his sword and land on his nose. There are so many ways in which an American ambassador, especially to the British, can trip. It seems unnecessary to hang a sword on him and have it get between his legs. He can trip over his tongue.

When a Chinaman goes officially to a British state event he goes as a Chinaman in the garments his own national taste tell him are proper. He has his own traditions and customs and they are accepted as good. No British chamberlain would tell a Persian, Turk, or Congo chieftain what to wear. Sitting Bull could have entered Westminster Abbey in feathers and buffalo skins, but Mr. Harvey is informed that the mode requires knee breeches, and for them he has neither the knees nor the calves. If he had been permitted to hang a pen from his sash he at least would have been physically safe. With the sword we know he was not, but he avoided the worst disaster.

American military men know what to do, because they have their uniforms for occasions. It would be just as sensible to compel Pershing to get into a Cossack suit for an occasion as to make Harvey get into something he can wear only by having all his countrymen laughing and swearing at him.

The State Department ought to call in some tailors and design and promulgate the standards of dress which the United States will consider adequate and fitting for any occasions of state which require the presence of its ambassadors. The dictates then will be the dictates of the Nation represented and thus they never can be questioned.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether any ambassador of the United States to any country in the world has ever appeared clothed in breeches and a sword? Is not such a costume contrary to the rules and customs which have governed United States ministers and ambassadors in the past?

Mr. HARRISON. Our present ambassador, I think, has appeared in the manner described in order to attract attention and set a precedent for others to follow.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to call up the bill making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, but I think we had better have a quorum before I ask unanimous consent to do so. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Nelson	Robinson
Ball	Harrison	New	Sheppard
Brandegee	Heflin	Newberry	Shields
Bursum	Johnson	Nicholson	Smith
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Spencer

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

COMMERCE AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment. I am not particular whether or not we follow the usual rule of acting first on committee amendments. I will merely ask that the bill be read for amendment.

Mr. KING. I think that is the better way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I understand the request to be that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for committee or other amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to that course. I think that is a very proper way to proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

NATIONAL SCREW THREAD COMMISSION.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me, in order that I may call up a House joint resolution the consideration of which will take but a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. MCNARY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let the joint resolution be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the term of the National Screw Thread Commission, created by an act approved July 18, 1918, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1919, is hereby extended for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Oregon whether he considers that this commission has been of any utility whatever and whether the prolongation of its life will be of any benefit to the people?

Mr. MCNARY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that, according to the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, which was followed by a unanimous vote extending the term of the commission, the commission have standardized to a very large extent the use of bolts and screws in the country. The passage of the resolution is heartily recommended by Mr. Hoover. It is a commission which receives no compensation; its services are entirely voluntary and without remuneration.

Mr. KING. I had in mind the fact that by the pending appropriation bill as well as by previous legislation the work of standardization of many things comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce; and I was wondering if on some of the numerous officials who are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce, and for whom we are making appropriations in order to aid them in bringing about standardization, should not devolve the duties that are discharged by this commission?

Mr. MCNARY. The clerical personnel of the commission is supplied by the Secretary of Commerce, and the activities of the commission involve no additional cost to the Government. The commission is doing a good work, but its life expires on the 21st of this month. This joint resolution is simply to extend the life of the commission for a period of five years.

Mr. KING. Have they as yet made any report whatever of their proceedings?

Mr. MCNARY. I regret that I can not answer the question of the Senator, much as I should like to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCE AND LABOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10559) making appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce," on page 3, line 20, after the word "foregoing," to strike out "$50,000" and to insert "$80,200," so as to read:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, newspapers (not exceeding $2,500); stationery; furniture and repairs to same; carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges; fuel, lighting, and heating; purchase and exchange of motor trucks and bicycles; maintenance, repair, and operation of two motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and of motor trucks and bicycles, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges; postage to foreign countries; telegraph and telephone service; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; repairs to building occupied by offices of the Secretary of Commerce; rental of water-cooling plant in Commerce Building, not to exceed $1,400; first-aid outfits for use in the buildings occupied by employees of this department; street car fares, not exceeding $300; and all other miscellaneous items and necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $80,200.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the House committee went into this matter very fully, may I ask the Senator from Washington why the committee provides an increase in the appropriation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Secretary came before us with reference to the item, and stated that he thought the House must have acted under a misapprehension of the situation. Items for the Census Bureau are being taken out of the lump-sum appropriation because that bureau is returning to the normal period. The Secretary says that in view of that situation the contingent expenses of the Census Bureau must come out of the expenses of the Secretary's office, which will take $30,200 out of the $50,000 appropriation. That will leave only $20,000 for the Secretary's office, which he stated would be utterly inadequate. He thought that the House must have been under a misapprehension, and therefore the committee felt, in view of the circumstances, that they should increase the appropriation.

Mr. KING. The amendment of the committee increases the appropriation which was allowed by the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is correct; but it was done upon the statement of the Secretary to which I have referred. I have here the statement and will read it to the Senator, if he desires to have it read.

Mr. KING. While I have the floor, may I inquire of the Senator how the appropriations in this bill dealing with or relating to the same objects and matters and the same Federal agencies, bureaus, and departments compare with the appropriations for the same agencies, bureaus, departments, et cetera, in former years? The bill now seems to be sui generis, and we can not by following it institute any comparison with the bills of former years, because there have been drawn into this appropriation bill appropriations which previously were carried in various other bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the bill which we are now considering provides for the maintenance of the department of the ideal Cabinet minister, Mr. Hoover. It is alleged in the public press that there have been great economies brought about in that department and other departments of the Government. However, I will read the Senator a comparison of the figures for the current fiscal year with those of the next fiscal year as provided in this bill. For commercial attachés in the last bill the appropriation was $171,000, while in this bill it is $200,000. In the bill of last year the appropriation for foreign and domestic commerce, and the promotion and development thereof, was $325,000, while in this bill it is $450,000.

The appropriation for the promotion of commerce in Central and South America last year was $100,000. In this bill it is $170,650.

The appropriation for the promotion of commerce in the Far East last year was $150,000. This year it is $166,150.

The appropriation for export industries last year was $250,000. This year it is $450,000.

Thus it appears that the total amount appropriated last year for these purposes was $1,228,510, while the total for those purposes in this bill is $1,669,310. This is the kind of economy that is going on in all departments—economizing upward instead of downward.

Mr. KING. And the Senator does not furnish figures showing what the increases have been in the other branches of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. The Senator calls attention only to what might be denominated the export and the import agencies or bureaus of the department.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know how it is about the others; but since there have been allusions in the papers to the so-called economies that have been shown by the administration in this particular department, I wanted to show that instead of economizing downward they are economizing upward, and this work is costing more this year by $400,000 than it did last year, even.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator from North Carolina think that the increased expenditures in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce which are brought about through the enlarged efforts of that department to find a market for American products abroad are unwise expenditures?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have heard a great deal of criticism on the other side of our former Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, accusing him of extravagance. We gave him appropriations for these commercial attachés and all these matters. Regardless of whether it is wise or not, I am talking about the reports in the papers that there is economy in this department, when there is not economy but an increase of expenditures by over $400,000. Whether they are wise or not is a question that I am not arguing. I am just talking about the reports in the papers that there has been a decrease in the appropriations for this department when it is not true.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator think it is proper to say that that is lack of economy, when he knows that this expenditure is made effectively to increase the markets for American products and thereby relieve the industrial situation of this country?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is another question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Ohio that if we are to judge from the results, we should expect condemnation of the Department of Commerce instead of commendation, for the reason that every month during the past year our foreign commerce has shrunk. This last month it is approximately 50 per cent, if not more, less than it was a year ago. As I recall, a year ago it was $370,000,000 for one month, and this last year it was $160,000,000 or $170,000,000. Our imports were less the last month than they were the preceding month, and our exports were very much less than they were, perhaps 50 per cent or more less than they were a year ago; so that if the Department of Commerce had been interested in finding foreign markets for our products it has signally failed.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him there, I do not see how he can draw the conclusion from the statement he makes that the department has failed. Here is a world condition. The Senator with others, I think, joined in the effort to enable this country to help the financing of organizations to permit the larger exportation of American products. Here is a condition with which we have sought to deal. I think the Senator will find that the work of the department has been very efficient. The mere fact that because of this world condition exports for a certain time have fallen off does not at all prove the Senator's contention that this department has not been efficient.

Personally, I believe, and I think the Senator will find that the business men of the country will sustain that view, that this expenditure in the effort to enlarge markets for American products is money very well expended.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Ohio rose, as I understood him, to combat the proposition which was made by the Senator from North Carolina, namely, that the expenditures of the Department of Commerce as well as other departments were greater than they were a year ago, and that notwithstanding these increases the Republican newspapers and the publicity advocates of the Republicans are constantly announcing great reforms and great economies; and the Senator from North Carolina called attention to just a few items in this bill showing that the increases were more than $1,000,000 over the same items for a year ago.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I rose to comment on what I thought was the mistaken view of the Senator from North Carolina that this was an unwise expenditure. Perhaps I misunderstood him; but since the Senator from Utah now goes into this larger field, I call his attention to the fact that economies are being wrought; that in the period of four months, through the transfer of material and supplies from one department where they are not needed to another department where they are needed, there has been a saving of $112,000,000. That is at the rate of about $7,000,000 per week, or about a million dollars a day. That saving has already been wrought.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIS. Just let me finish this statement, if the Senator please. Furthermore, the expenses of the Government this year are some $580,000,000 below the estimates, and something like a billion and a half below the expenditures of last year; so economies have been wrought and are being wrought.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, here is one department that shows an increase instead of a decrease. There has been a great deal of cutting off of war supplies and property increased on account of the war in every department; but as to the legitimate expenses of the Government, the Senator will find, if he will examine all the appropriation bills as compared with those of last year, that there is no economy, but that more has been appropriated than was appropriated before. I am talking about the legitimate expenses of the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know just what the Senator means by that expression; but he does not question the statement that the expense of the Government this year has been decreased beneath the expense last year by about a billion and a half dollars He does not deny that, does he?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not the legitimate expenses of the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know what the Senator means by "legitimate expenses." The amount that it has been found necessary to expend has been cut off a billion and a half in a year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the ordinary expenses of the Government will show any decrease.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from North Carolina contends and the Senator from Utah contends that there has been no economy, when the fact is that there has been economy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am glad that the administration has such an eloquent defender of its rather dark, devious, and unsatisfactory record not only in the matter of economy but its record relating to general legislation, both foreign and domestic. I have not time, nor is it my purpose, to discuss that broad field at this time; but we hear so much, and the Senator from Ohio now repeats some of what we constantly hear, of the economies of the administration that some who are of inquisitive mind are led to inquire where are the manifestations of this economy?

I read in the press this morning that the Secretary of the Treasury is compelled immediately to negotiate loans; short-time certificates are to be issued amounting to more than $250,000,000; the revenues that are flowing into the Treasury are inadequate to meet maturing interest upon national obligations, as well as various forms of obligations which will be presented for payment within a few weeks. The Government will be compelled to borrow, in times of peace, within the next few days, more than $250,000,000. How much more the Government will be compelled to borrow during the present fiscal year it is impossible to determine; but I say to the Senator now, and I hope he will take the trouble to verify my prophecy at the expiration of the year, that when this fiscal year shall have ended there will have been presented to the Senate of the United States deficiency bills aggregating more than $500,000,000, and that the deficit—that is, the expenditures over the receipts—for the fiscal year will be more than $500,000,000. And that enormous deficit will exist notwithstanding the oppressive burdens of taxation imposed upon the people. It was claimed by the Republicans that when they got control of the legislative branch of the Government they would repeal war-time legislation, particularly that dealing with revenue and taxation, and that a fair and liberal tax bill would be presented. They declared that the people were burdened by the war taxes and that immediate relief would be granted. The Republican Congress not only refused to enact a revenue bill during the two years they were in control of Congress when Mr. Wilson was President, but they passed appropriation bills which consumed all the taxes pouring into the Treasury. When they got control of all branches of the Government one year ago there were promises of great reforms and reduced taxation. The reforms have not come and the reduced taxation is caused by the deadly paralysis which Republican policies have produced.

I repeat, this Republican administration, pledged to important reforms and great economies, will at the end of the fiscal year have deficiencies of hundreds of millions of dollars, which will have to be met by extensive loans, evidenced by bonds or short-time certificates. In my opinion the record will show expenditures of more than 50 per cent over the aggregate expenses of the Government during either of the years 1914, 1915, or 1916.

Some time ago it was stated that there had been saved about $125,000,000. That was announced from the White House amid great applause. It was proclaimed throughout the country as a marvelous Republican achievement, and as an exhibition of the fine executive ability of the administration. I offered a resolution to try to find out what had become of this vagrant and fugitive $125,000,000, in order that it might be covered into the Treasury of the United States. The resolution is lost. The money has not been found. It has not yet been covered into the Treasury. Probably it has evaporated, or has started on a long journey, seeking to overtake the fugitive promises of the Republican Party. The fact is, there was no $125,000,000 saving, as announced by the White House, and there will be no return to the Treasury of this sum or of any part of it.

My good friend from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] declares that there has been a saving of $112,000,000 in supplies. Mr. President, when the Republicans took charge of the legislative branch of the Government three years ago there were billions of dollars of surplus war supplies on hand. Efforts were made by many Democrats to secure the disposition of this property, and to cover into the Treasury of the United States at as early a date as possible the proceeds derived therefrom. Our Republican friends have proceeded in a leisurely way, and at this late hour there are still hundreds of millions of surplus property undisposed of. The costs involved in caring for this property has been enormous. If there has been any saving there is no concrete evidence of that fact. The Republicans have been in power in all branches of the Government for one year, and as stated, there are still hundreds of millions of dollars of these supplies on hand.

I am not quite able to understand what the Senator means by this saving of $112,000,000. During and immediately following the war there were important changes made in administrative procedure and coordination occurred in many executive agencies. There is a broad field for economy in the consolidating of purchasing divisions, and one would have thought that Gen. Dawes, clothed with the tremendous power which I assume he possesses and which it is generally understood he possesses, would have effectuated greater consolidation and coordination in executive agencies and departments of the Government. For years it has been recognized that there were too many scattered and disconnected agencies where labors and activities overlapped. Gen. Dawes was to improve these conditions and secure higher efficiency and greater economy. I am afraid his powers have been curtailed or that he has been unable to combat the resistance of executive bureaus.

I have examined the pending bill with a view to determining just what appropriations were carried in preceding years for the same objects as are provided for in this bill. Under the new method of preparing appropriation bills it is impossible to determine what the appropriations were in former years for the particular subjects and matters referred to in the reported bills. I will ask the Senator now if he has any tables which make possible a fair comparison between the pending bill and former bills, in order that we may ascertain whether there have been increases or decreases in the appropriations for the subjects and the items and the objects which are provided for and taken care of in the pending bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, of course, it is rather difficult to compare this bill with any previous bill, because of the change in the methods of making the appropriations. Many of these items were carried in the sundry civil bill heretofore and many of them were carried in the legislative bill—the salaries and so forth—so that a comparison is difficult; but in the report made by the House on this bill, report No. 719, the Senator will find a comparative statement of the amounts appropriated for 1922, the estimates for 1923, and the amount recommended in the accompanying bill in the House. I will be glad to furnish this to the Senator, and it gives a tabulated statement. I want to say that in the aggregate we have increased the bill as it came from the House by over $400,000.

Mr. KING. The committee has increased the bill over the appropriation for the fiscal year 1922 to the extent of $2,684,629.25.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was just coming to that. The bill increases the appropriations over those for 1922 by $2,684,629.25, but $1,240,000 of that increase is made necessary by the maternity law, which we passed just a short time ago. The item for that on page 54 of the bill is $1,240,000, and that accounts for that much of the increase.

Then, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has said, we have increased the appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and so on. We have done it, we believe, in the interest of economy. I do not think the country will understand that we have necessarily been economical where we appropriate $10 this year for an item for which we appropriated $50 the year before, because by our failure to appropriate the amount appropriated last year, or a greater amount, we may cause a loss to the industries of the country, to the prosperity of the country, to the business of the country, of many millions of dollars. Economy is not measured by the difference in the number of dollars and cents we appropriate from one year to another. The House increased the appropriation for the Department of Commerce, and the Senate has increased the appropriations made by the House, because we believed that it was economy to do it, because we believe that this is the time when we want to take all reasonable steps we can take in order to hold up our commerce.

Of course, everybody knows, the Senator knows, that our foreign commerce can not be kept up to the level attained during the war. However, we want to do everything within reason to hold it up to that level as nearly as we can; but we must get down to normal conditions, and when we do, our imports and our exports will not be what they were during the war. We can not expect them to be.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator expect that we shall have any imports except those on the free list if the demands of some of those who are in Washington seeking legislation are complied with and there emerges from the deliberations of the Republicans who are framing the tariff bill in the Senate the kind of a bill which is promised? I am sure the Senator will reach the conclusion that we shall have but little foreign commerce if that policy is pursued.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not intend to discuss the doctrine of protection in this connection. I believe in protection and I believe I have just as good reasons for my belief as the Senator has for his belief on the other side. So we might stand here and argue from now until the middle of next year, and the Senator would have the same opinion he has now and I would probably have the same opinion I entertain.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator is not so incorrigible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am pretty well set in the doctrine of protection to American industries.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no use to discuss that in connection with the question of the importance of foreign and domestic commerce. As the Senator knows, I have been one of the chief advocates of the development of that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The only thing which led me to bring this up was that there had been a misstatement made. The public is being misled, whether this is a wise provision or not, when it is claimed that these appropriations have been decreased, when, as a matter of fact, they have been increased. I may vote for this provision, but I refer to the misrepresentation which has been made by the newspapers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not favor misrepresentation. I do not believe any party gains anything by misleading or attempting to mislead the people of the country. As far as I am concerned, I have tried not to do that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is one of the fairest and one of the ablest men on our committee, and the reason why I asked him the question is because it has been stated that there was a decrease in the appropriations, when that is not true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have not seen any statement from what I considered an authoritative source to the effect that the appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the Government are less than they were before we entered the war or equal to them. I did see a statement a short time ago, which I think was made on the floor of the House, that the appropriations for the normal operations of the Government would be about $250,000,000 more than the appropriations for the normal operations of the Government before we entered into the war, and if that is correct, I think it is a wonderful showing. If we have been able to get the normal expenses of the Government down to within $250,000,000 of what they were in 1914, I think we have been doing splendidly. I believe it is a record we have a right to be proud of.

Mr. KING. There will be some controversy as to what the normal expenses are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly so.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that if we get within $500,000,000 of what the prewar expenses were I shall be ready to crown the Senator with a laurel wreath.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to call attention to the fact that for the Census Office we have appropriated for this year a little over $1,600,000, while in 1922 the normal expenses of the Census were only $750,000; but the extraordinary work of the census was taken care of out of a lump sum, and we are now paying all of the appropriations for the census in the regular appropriations. We are making no lump-sum appropriations for that bureau. That accounts for seven or eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. Last year they were closing up the census, and it cost $2,000,000. Now we have an appropriation of $1,600,000 carried in this bill, and the census is closed and gotten through with.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They had over $2,000,000 last year, which had been appropriated for, and that was used.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was for taking the census, but now there is no census being taken.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have not closed up all the work of the census.

Mr. OVERMAN. They have closed up most of the work, except the publication.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I venture to say that there is not an item in connection with the census to which the Senator would make any objection. We have to take care of that. I am not saying we are making a smaller appropriation of money than heretofore; certainly not; we are increasing it. I do not believe we have increased these appropriations enough. I think it would have been wiser if we had made them nearer the Budget estimates than we have done; but I have not felt it wise, under all the circumstances, to go that far.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Ohio, although I want to yield the floor in a moment.

Mr. WILLIS. I will wait until the Senator gets through, because I want to make some observations.

Mr. KING. I thought perhaps the Senator wanted to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to answer a question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah asked me a question a while ago about the employees. I have a statement here of the employees of the different departments of the Government, which I got some time ago for other purposes than use in connection with this bill, but it will come in here very well.

Mr. KING. Does that show the number of employees in 1914, 1915, and 1916?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it does not show that. This is from the Bureau of Efficiency, a statement showing the number of civil employees in the Government service January 1, 1921, July 1, 1921, and December 31, 1921.

It shows that in the Department of Commerce on January 1, 1921, in the District of Columbia, there were 4,719 employees; and on December 31, 1921, there were 3,499.

In the field on January 1, 1921, there were 8,042, and on December 31, 1921, there were 7,989; or a total on January 1, 1921, of 12,761, and a total on December 31, 1921, of 11,488.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know what that department had in 1916?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator state that the number of employees in the Department of Commerce is over 12,000 now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is 11,488, in the field and in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Would the "field" include those who are abroad?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I think so. I do not suppose that the Department of Commerce increased the number of its employees during the war as the other departments did. There was probably a sort of a normal increase, with the growth and development of the business.

I do not present this statement to show that there were more employees under the preceding administration than under this one. I do not know about that; I have not examined into that. I simply present it to show that since this administration came in it has been reducing the number of employees in the Department of Commerce. This gives some valuable information in reference to all the departments in that respect, and I am going to ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that. Does the statement show the number of employees in the District of Columbia on December 31, 1921?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; there were 75,786.

Mr. KING. That is more than double, or approximately double, the number of employees in the District of Columbia on January 1, 1917.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably so.

Mr. KING. It was somewhat less than 40,000 at that date.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think this shows that during the last six months we have decreased the number of employees of the Government over 43,000. I have not any doubt but what there will be a further decrease, and I have no doubt that there ought to be a further decrease; but it takes time. We can not cut them off all at once.

I am not criticizing anyone because of the tremendous business which was built up during the war, and the Senator has never heard me criticize anyone on that ground, because I recognize that the administration had a tremendous task to perform and had to perform it under terrific conditions, and they did the best they could. They made a lot of mistakes, probably, which when we look back upon them we see could have been avoided; but that is gone; that is past. I feel they did the best they could. Of course, it is up to us, as long as we have control, to get things down to as economical a basis as we can. But we can not do it all at once. It takes time. If we try to do it all at once, we will cause more disorganization and more loss and inefficiency. I ask that this table may be put in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF EFFICIENCY,
Washington, February 4, 1922.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith a statement showing the number of civil employees in the Government service on January 1, 1921, July 1, 1921, and December 31, 1921. This is in response to your oral request made early in the week.

Yours, very truly,

HERBERT D. BROWN,
Chief, Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. KING. The great increase in the number of employees during the war was in the War and Navy Departments, and in those agencies of the Government which were directly or indirectly connected with the war—with the Military and the Naval Establishments.

Mr. President, it seems to me that since the war the departments of the Government have been too indifferent to the requirements of economy and too slow in demobilizing the civil employees of the Government. We had in Washington, as the Senator knows, more than 100,000 employees during the war. More than three years after the war we have in Washington more than double the number employed in the departments prior to the war. I have heard no suitable excuse for the failure of the departments to bring about the reduction in the personnel which the situation demanded.

There is no reason why there should be 70,000 or more employees in the District of Columbia. The Senator will recall that one of the most severe criticisms made by his party during the last campaign was based upon the charge that there were too many persons in the employ of the Government, and it was said that the Republican Party, if it should win the election, would immediately proceed to reduce the number of employees in the Government service until the prewar status was reached. Notwithstanding our Republican friends have been in charge of the legislative department of the Government for three years and of the executive department for one year, the number of employees in Washington is double the number in service January 1, 1912, and my information is that the number outside of Washington is greatly in excess of the 1917 force.

Mr. President, there have been, of course, reductions in the general appropriations in the aggregate of the appropriations, but an examination will show that those reductions have been generally, if not exclusively, in those branches of the Government that we might denominate war branches. Of course, with the termination of the war and the demobilization of the Army, the military expenses would be materially reduced. We spent billions during the war for war purposes.

The Senator certainly can not claim credit for his party because in peace times we are not expending the huge sums which war demanded. During the war the Navy received billions of dollars. For the current fiscal year approximately $500,000,000 was appropriated, but that was $200,000,000 too much, and for the next fiscal year the naval appropriations should not exceed $250,000,000. I hope our Republican friends will make proper reductions in both the Army and Navy budgets. I doubt whether our Republican friends will have the courage to effectuate proper economies.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator in a moment.

I think it may safely be said that all the appropriation bills which deal with what the Senator from North Carolina has denominated the ordinary expenses of the Government and all the other appropriation bills in the aggregate will carry more than was appropriated for the fiscal year 1922, and of course will carry hundreds of millions of dollars more than was appropriated in 1914 or 1915 or 1916 for the ordinary expenses of the Government.

I am glad now to yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from Utah, one of the leaders on the other side of the aisle, complains of the large expenditures for the Army and the Navy, and asserts that those expenditures ought to be reduced next year. Will the Senator aid in the reduction of those expenditures by supporting the treaty that makes possible the reduction of such expenditures?

Mr. KING. If the Senator refers to the treaty which limits the construction of capital ships, I am very glad to assure him that I shall vote for that treaty.

Mr. WILLIS. Fine!

Mr. KING. Why did not the Senator vote for my motion which I submitted when we were considering the naval appropriation bill since he has been in the Senate, referring it back to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to reduce it $100,000,000? If we had done that some of the capital ships upon which money has been wasted would not have progressed to the degree of completion which we now find and we would have $100,000,000 more in the Treasury, or $100,000,000 less of outstanding bonds representing the appropriation which we wasted.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator directs to me a question. I did not vote for that proposition, because I was unwilling to disarm this country until some arrangement should be made which would make such disarmament safe. Such an arrangement is now before the Senate, and yet the Senator by his statement leaves the implication that he proposes to oppose the arrangement which makes possible the reduction of armies and navies, and yet he will vote to reduce our armies and navies. That is why I did not vote for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. KING. I anticipated that the Senator would reply, if he did reply, as he has, namely, that to have reduced the appropriation for the Navy $100,000,000 would mean disarming. I think the position of my distinguished friend is not tenable. When we were spending $150,000,000 a year for the Navy, we were developing a strong and efficient Navy. It was not necessary to appropriate $400,000,000 for the Navy for the current fiscal year, and to have appropriated three hundred and ninety and odd million dollars would not have been to disarm the United States.

I do not think that my friend can convince the American people that we would have disarmed by appropriating $400,000,000 for the Navy for the present fiscal year instead of $500,000,000. The fact is that the attitude of the United States was a menace to the peace of the world. We were talking of war and denouncing Japan and Great Britain and demanding the greatest navy in the world. We proposed in the 1915–16 program a naval policy that would cost the American people the stupendous sum of $1,500,000,000. We proposed to carry out the program of 1915–16, which called for the construction of a large number of capital ships and the appropriations for ships of all classes, the necessary harbors and the necessary supplementary equipment, amounted to $1,500,000,000. It was to be expected that the militant attitude of the United States would cause Japan and other nations to look with anxiety upon our navalistic policy, a policy which to some seemed to portend an imperialistic ambition upon the part of the United States.

Notwithstanding our foolish reactionary naval policy, Great Britain broke up three of her capital ships which were upon the stocks, thus losing $16,500,000 that had been expended upon them. France broke up one great ship upon which some work had been expended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, no money had been expended on the three new super-Hoods contemplated in the British program except in the way of designing and assembling material.

Mr. KING. The figures which were presented in the House of Commons showed that there had been expended—I do not know in what form the expenditures had been made——

Mr. LODGE. I do. That is why I was stating it on the authority of the first lord of the admiralty.

Mr. KING. I am not challenging the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I know that Lord Lee and others in the House of Commons, when the question was under discussion, announced that there had been spent upon the three super-Hoods approximately $16,500,000.

Mr. LODGE. Approximately $16,000,000, that is true; but the Senator spoke of the breaking up of ships. Great Britain has not broken them up, because nothing had been made except in the way of designs and something in the way of assembling materials. No building had been done.

Mr. KING. The Senator may be correct in that. I shall not controvert his statement. I will qualify my statement to the extent of stating that notwithstanding our determination, as evinced by the appropriations which we have made, to continue the 1915–16 program, the Parliament of Great Britain did not approve of the policy of completing the super-Hoods and suspended any further work upon them. My recollection of the discussion is that some materials have been assembled and some little work has been done upon the hulls of these super-Hoods. But it is certain that Great Britain, notwithstanding the avowed purpose of the United States to complete the 1916 program, which would have made our Navy the most powerful in the world, ceased construction upon capital ships and also scrapped many war vessels after the war was ended. Her conduct was an invitation to the world to cease naval armament and to reduce the heavy burdens incident to military and naval operations.

Mr. LODGE. They appropriated for the super-Hoods, but suspended work upon them until the result of the conference was known, and nothing will be done if these treaties are ratified.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that the conference and other causes will perhaps dispose of the three super-Hoods, either one of which would have been greater than any capital ship which we have.

Mr. LODGE. Very much greater. They were to be 49,000 tons.

Mr. KING. The super-Hoods were to be 55,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. The figures they gave to the conference here were that they would not be over 49,000 tons, which is 15,000 tons larger than any ship in any other navy except the one Hood, which is 41,000 tons.

Mr. KING. My information is based upon the discussions in the House of Commons in which Lord Lee, who was a delegate here, participated, and my recollection of the discussions is that the super-Hoods were to be 55,000 tons and to carry 18-inch or 20-inch guns, so that those ships would have been superior to any ship which the United States now has or would have under the 1915–16 program.

Mr. LODGE. That is true. Our largest were 42,000 tons.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, Great Britain had abandoned the construction of the super-Hoods prior to the Washington conference; but, of course, the agreement as to naval disarmament which was made at the conference will end the building of these huge vessels.

The Senator from Ohio in a very cheerful and, I was about to say, boastful spirit—and I do not use the word "boastful" in any offensive way—called attention to the work of the conference in respect to the reduction of armament. I am sure that all on this side will welcome any policy that will result in reducing the cost of military and naval operations. It seems to me that all should support a policy which will relieve the people from the waste and burdens of huge naval and military establishments.

The United States, as a peace-loving, Christian Nation, ought to take the lead in efforts for world peace. It fears no nation, it covets no territory belonging to other nations. It should seek by example and precept to bring concord and justice into all international relations. The Senator from Massachusetts closed his notable address yesterday with an eloquent peroration, in which he pleaded for a spirit of peace and for the moral leadership of this great Republic. I rejoiced in his words and regretted that he had not uttered them when we were considering the Versailles treaty, which was fraught with so much consequence to the world. I believed then, as I believe now, that there should be not merely a concert of nations but an association of all nations of the world in the interest of world peace. The League of Nations sought the peace and freedom of all nations. We should have done our part to make its work effective. If we had, there would have been no Washington conference, the results of which are still uncertain and problematical. There is ground for apprehension that the four-power pact may be regarded by some as an attempt to set up a little entente or a little league of nations as an opponent of the League of Nations. Some may regard with resentment this quadruple alliance or association as an attempt to set up another organization rivaling the league, or an organization which seeks hegemony not only in the Orient but in all the world.

If resentments should be developed by the four-power pact, or if it should be regarded as a rival of the league created under the Versailles treaty, then the treaty before us might prove a menace to the peace of the world. There are some who have not yet been persuaded that the four-power pact will not be so regarded by nations of the world, but if it can be established that this treaty will promote peace and will be regarded with favor by the nations who are members of the League of Nations, I believe there will be some who will vote for its ratification who at present are inclined to vote against the treaty.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia and Mr. WILLIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I must yield first to the Senator from Georgia, who rose first.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but in direct line with his thought is the suggestion that the soviet principle, embodied by Russia and put in practice by Russia, is already knocking at the doors of China, and there is no reasonable doubt that there will be a union in the policies of Russia and China and Siberia within a very short while.

Mr. KING. My information, may I say to the Senator, is that for over two years there have been representatives of the soviet government in various parts of China, a large number of representatives who have been carrying on an extensive propaganda for the purpose of establishing a dictatorship of the proletariat—governed by the principles of the third internationales, and to effectuate some sort of union between the Chinese Government and the soviet government of Moscow.

It is quite likely that in some parts of China their intrigues have been successful. I sincerely hope, however, that the pacific characteristics of the Chinese and their love of law and order, speaking generally of the Chinese people, will enable them to resist these intrigues and this propaganda of the soviet government. I believe that China will not ally herself with the Lenin and Trotsky government, but will develop along safe and sound constitutional lines—giving to the people a liberal and progressive government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that if China does not ally herself with the soviet government it will be due more to the result of the Washington conference than to any other one cause?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish that I could answer that question affirmatively. The Senator from Wisconsin may have information which I do not possess, but some of my informants tell me that the Washington conference has tended to divide the Chinese people, that schisms have been created, and that those schisms may result in a fratricidal conflict. I do not yet know what the results of the conference will be so far as China is concerned. I had hoped that the result of the conference would be to alienate China from Russia, if there was any disposition upon her part to form a hard and fast alliance with Russia, and to bring union to all factions in China, and also bring concord and peace not only in the Pacific but upon the mainland of Asia. I sincerely hope that Japan and China have been brought closer together, and that China will with zeal address herself to the great task of developing her mighty resources and fitting herself and her people to fill an important place in the affairs of the world. I am inclined to think that the result of the conference will, generally speaking, tend to improve the conditions in China and in the Far East.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator from Utah admit that one of the results of the Washington conference has been to remove the great menace which was contained in the treaty of Versailles with relation to Shantung?

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, the treaty of Versailles, as it was argued so fully here upon the floor of the Senate when the treaty was before us, was not, as I interpreted it and as many others interpreted it, a menace to China. I believe that the treaty of Versailles and the machinery of that treaty afforded full opportunity for the settlement and would bring about a settlement of any controversy growing out of Shantung. Moreover, as the minutes of the Versailles conference disclose, Japan promised—and I believe she would have kept that promise—within a reasonable time to withdraw from Shantung and to restore to China whatever in Shantung Japan claimed to have succeeded to in virtue of her entrance into the World War and her expulsion of Germany from the Orient.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I hardly see how the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] could be well founded, in view of the fact that Japan's continued occupation of Korea is in violation of two very solemn treaties recently made and a standing insult and provocation to China, and the Washington conference leaves Japan with a title undisputed in Korea and also leaves her in the possession of two of China's largest Provinces, Manchuria and Mongolia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is a digression from the bill which is before us. I arose only for the purpose of calling attention to an item in the bill and to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] if he had any data which would show the amount of appropriations carried in this bill for the same subjects which had been provided for in former bills. I think the answer of the Senator from Washington shows that we have appropriated more for the same objects or purposes in the pending bill than was carried in appropriation bills for similar items a year ago; that instead of there being a reduction there is an increase. That is also true of a number of bills which have been brought before us which have carried appropriations for the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. President, this Congress is not redeeming the pledges made by the Republican Party. It is bankrupting the Treasury, increasing expenditures, borrowing money, issuing short-term bonds for hundreds of millions of dollars. Economic disaster has overtaken the people, and in all parts of the land the cries of distress are heard. This is the Republican Party's record.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that, of course, there are some items in the bill as to which I think there is a decrease and some items where there is an increase. In the aggregate there is an increase of probably $2,000,000 or something like that.

Mr. KING. I wish to make merely one further observation. The Senator from Washington stated that the pending bill proposes to appropriate less than was recommended by the Budget Bureau. Mr. President, that statement by the Senator is a refutation of the contention which was so vociferously made by those who were claiming that the millennium was at hand because we had passed the Budget law. A number of Senators when the Budget bill was under consideration stated that if economies were effectuated they would be brought about by the legislative branch of the Government rather than by the executive branch. The Budget Bureau is an executive branch of the Government, and yet Congress, which is supposed to be profligate in its expenditures of the public money, has cut the Budget recommendations by millions of dollars. In this very bill the Budget Bureau recommended an appropriation of more than $2,000,000 in excess of the appropriation now carried by the bill; and yet Senators and Representatives on the committees dealing with the subjects have recommended appropriations in this bill less than were recommended by the Budget Bureau. That has also been true of the other appropriation bills which have been brought before us. So the Budget Bureau apparently has not effectuated any reforms; whatever reductions have been made have been made by Congress and not by the executive branch of the Government; all of which demonstrates that if there are to be economies brought about those economies must be worked out by the House of Representatives and by the Senate; if we are to cut expenses those expenses will have to be reduced by Congress itself and not by the executive branches of the Government.

I wish to say, however, that I believe President Harding has addressed himself with earnestness to a reduction in the expenditures of the Government. He certainly ought to have done so, when he perceived the constantly diminishing stream of revenue and the enormous drafts made upon the Treasury. The Chief Executive owes it to the country to utilize every force at his command to bring about reforms and economies. Of course, the Senate and the House of Representatives must second his efforts and even go beyond them, because the pressure upon the Executive and upon the heads of the executive departments for appropriations is so great that the President and the executive heads will in most cases ask for larger appropriations than Congress will be willing to make. The legislative branch will prove to be the check valve upon the executive departments of the Government if retrenchment and economy are to be accomplished.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to impede the passage of the pending bill, and therefore I shall not follow the Senator from Utah into the many interesting fields into which he has gone. It is always a delight to listen to his prophecies, even though they are somewhat gloomy and Cassandralike at times, but our fear may be modified to a considerable extent by reflecting upon the fact that other prophecies which the Senator has made have not come true.

Now, there is a question raised here as to the credit of the Government and as to whether or not there have been economies. I think the people of the country who buy Government bonds are pretty fair judges of that question. If the Senator's view is correct that the expenses of the Government have gone on increasing and are to increase indefinitely, certainly that would have its effect on the quotations on Government bonds. I have before me——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I stated that the war expenditures and those which would come under the head of war expenditures necessarily had decreased and would decrease.

Mr. WILLIS. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. KING. What I said with respect to the increase in expenditures had reference to those which the Senator from North Carolina had denominated the ordinary expenditures of the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from North Carolina, as I understood him, was discussing the expenditures of the particular department provided for in this bill. We are now talking not only about that but about the larger expenditures of the Government. What I am now saying is that if the Senator's contention is true, that economy has been lacking, if there have been extravagant expenditures, surely that would have found some reflection in the condition of Government credit. Governmental expenditures are not the only thing that affects Government credit; they are one of the factors that do affect Government credit; and, generally speaking, as governmental expenditures go down Government credit goes up. So let us see how the Senator's contention works out, and ascertain what has been accomplished in a year.

The Senator has referred to the fact that the party to which I have the honor to belong has been in control of the Government for a year. Let us see what has happened to Government bonds in a year. Liberty 3½'s, 1932–1947, a year ago were selling at 90; they are now selling at 97. That does not look as though the people lack confidence in the credit of the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator has, I think, supported the view of some of our Republican friends and many Democrats, that there ought to be a constitutional amendment to prohibit the States and political subdivisions of States from issuing tax-exempt securities. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it has been stated in financial circles that because of the depression in many industries and in business generally available funds for investment have been driven from business, that the only competition has been in Government bonds, and the demand for Government bonds has been so great because money could not be induced to invest in industrial securities and in business on account of hard times and precarious financial conditions in the United States. That has caused a rise in the bonds of the United States. I might say, further, to the Senator——

Mr. WILLIS. What was the Senator's question; I have been listening and trying to recognize it.

Mr. KING. I state now that the Senator has attributed the rise in the quotation of the price of Government bonds to the conduct of the Republican Party. If that is true, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that under the Republican Party industry has languished, bankruptcy has come to business, and millions of dollars which, in good times under an administration where proper laws were enacted and wise regulations were enforced, would have been available for investment in industrial development have been invested in Government bonds, and that has tended to increase the price of Government bonds as well as many municipal securities.

Mr. OVERMAN. Government bonds are also purchased to escape the income tax.

Mr. WILLIS. I am still waiting for the Senator's question. All of the discussion is interesting, but I should like to ascertain what is the Senator's question.

Mr. KING. If the Senator has not apprehended it, I am afraid I shall be powerless to make it plainer.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator has not stated his question.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the increase in the price of Government bonds has been because many persons who had money available for investment have sought tax-exempt securities rather than invest their funds in industries where the situation was so threatening and so menacing and where times were so hard as they have been since the Republican Party has been in power?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, that is another question that I shall be glad to discuss with the Senator some day. I agree with him in the view that we have issued in this country too many tax-free securities. As to whether it is necessary to have a constitutional amendment to regulate that, I do not now express an opinion. I am informed that we have now perhaps $16,000,000,000 of tax-free securities. Undoubtedly that has an effect upon industry; but I want to pursue just a little further this, to me, rather interesting table. If, under the Republican administration, everything were going to pieces, it certainly would be reflected somewhere in these prices of bonds.

Here is another type of bonds, Liberty second fours, 1927–42, quoted a year ago at 87. They are now quoted at 97.1, and so on. I ask permission to print that table at the close of my very brief remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. WILLIS. The fact is that Liberty bonds have gone up something like 10 per cent. Those that were selling at 85 are now selling at about 95. While I recognize that it is not the only cause, the credit of the Government has something to do with that.

I do not intend to follow the Senator from Utah into the interesting field of discussion of the treaties just now. The remark that he made leads me to think that there is some hope in his case that he is open to argument. The only thing I want to say is that it seems to me that the treaty which undertakes to settle the questions which have been provoking the nations to this competition in armament is the most important treaty of the lot. So far as I am concerned, if the Senate shall refuse to ratify the so-called four-power treaty, that undertakes to remove the causes of war, I doubt whether I should vote to ratify the treaty that would undertake to limit naval armaments; but I shall not go further into that question now.

Something has been said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] about the number of employees in the Government service. I think the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has covered that, perhaps, in the table that he has had printed in the RECORD. I simply call attention to the fact that there has been a constant, and, I think, a very reasonable decrease.

On the 11th day of November, 1918, the civil employees of the Government numbered 917,760.

On July 31, 1920, that number had been reduced to 691,116.

On December 1, 1920, the number had been reduced to 640,175.

On July 31, 1921, the number had been reduced to 597,482.

The latest report we have is of date November 11 last, as I have it, 568,326; and the Senator from Washington says that within the last six months there has been a reduction in the number of employees of something like 40,000. There has been a reduction. There is not any question about that.

The Senator talks interestingly about cooperation amongst the departments. He seems not to have been aware of the fact that that is exactly the thing that is now being had—a thing that we have not had heretofore. The difficulty heretofore has been that each department has tended to flock off by itself and build up an independent government, with all of its different functions. Under wise executive leadership the different bureaus and departments have been brought together, and they now understand that there is not to be so much effort at star playing, but more of teamwork; and as the result of that, as I have already pointed out, the expenses for the year have been reduced $582,000,000 below the estimates, and a billion and a half below the expenses of the preceding year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the reduction in the number of employees has been largely in the War Department and the Navy Department and in those agencies that had to do with the disposition of the war supplies, and, to use the common expression, the cleaning-up process following the war. For instance, I think about a year ago it was shown that there were employees in the War Department engaged in handling the supplies, guarding the various cantonments, and so forth, numbering approximately 90,000. I remember that something was said upon the floor of the Senate that there seemed to be nearly as many employees in the War Department as there were soldiers in the Army; and of course in the War Risk Insurance Bureau during that period, when millions of claims were being filed, sometimes 10,000 a day, the number of employees was prodigious. It exceeded 20,000. There necessarily must have been reduction if there was any efficiency.

In my opinion the reductions have not been sufficient. In the War Risk Bureau decentralization has been carried out, with a view, among other things, to economy and a reduction in the number of employees, but large units have been established in various parts of the United States where thousands of persons were found positions costing the Government millions annually. The cost of the policy of decentralization has been very, very great. I am told by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that there are 18,000 employees now in the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think the table that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] submitted to go into the RECORD showed that there were in the War Risk Bureau—which is now known as the Veterans' Bureau, having taken over the functions of the War Risk Bureau—18,277 employees.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one word further, amplifying the statement which I made to the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator made a very excellent point, and one which upon its face seems persuasive in support of his argument, when he quoted the rise in the market price of Government bonds. Let me say to my good friend that if he examines the quotations he will find that municipal bonds and many State bonds have responded to the rising bond market, perhaps more rapidly and in greater proportion than the Federal bonds. I have heard of State and municipal bonds selling above par, but I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that many persons have disposed of their real estate and other property, and instead of investing as they ordinarily would have done in business or in industrials, because of the unsettled conditions in our country and throughout the world they have sought investments where no risks were involved. Accordingly they purchased municipal and State and Federal bonds, which are exempt from taxation. They prefer a less rate of interest and perfectly secure investments.

I recall that quite recently a friend of mine purchased from one of the largest estates in New York a building for $250,000; and he told me that many persons were disposing of their real estate and other properties because of the high taxes and the small returns from their properties and investing in Government bonds or other tax-exempt securities. The heavy Federal and State taxes and the uncertain conditions in the business world have led those having available funds for investment to seek tax-exempt securities. This has led to competition in the bond market, thus forcing higher levels for tax-exempt securities. Before the war there were available for investments approximately $4,000,000,000 annually. Railroad and other enterprises were developed and capital sought fields in business activities. Now few business enterprises, in comparison with what we need, are being developed, and the capital that is required for the revival of business is being driven by high taxation—high taxation of the Federal Government and the State and the municipal governments—into tax-exempt securities. If we would have a proper revival in business we must free business from the enormous taxes and burdens and impediments now resting upon it. As long as the people are compelled to pay, as they are now, billions of dollars for State and Federal taxes, men who have money for investment will place it in tax-exempt securities rather than invest it in industrials and in business activities and enterprises. Business must be given a fair chance; industry must not be unduly hampered and shackled. The Government should attend to Government concerns and not seek to place the heavy and paralyzing hand of a deadly bureaucracy upon those who are seeking to bring back prosperity and rescue our country from economic and industrial destruction.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not desire to cut off any debate. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I probably shall have to give up the floor at 1 o'clock, and I should like to get as far along in the bill as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

And to insert:

Employees at fish-cultural stations: Thirty-five superintendents, at $1,500 each; foremen—13, at $1,200 each; 1 $1,080, 1 $1,000, 1 $960; fish-culturists—4, at $960 each; 36, at $900 each; apprentice fish-culturists—6 at $900 each, 1 $780, 9 at $720 each, 88 at $600 each; custodian of lobster pound, $720; custodian, $360; laborer, $600; engineers—2 at $1,100 each; 1 $1,000; 2 machinists at $960 each; firemen—2 at $720 each; 8 at $600 each; cooks—2 at $900 each, 1 $480; in all, $188,160.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask the Senator who has this bill in charge just the status of the items under the Bureau of Fisheries. The amendment proposes to strike out all that part of the House text which names the various locations and put in a lump-sum arrangement, as it were.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will note that all these various items simply provide for the employees. We have provided for them by this amendment just as the House provided. Instead of naming each station, we provide for 35 superintendents, and so on.

Mr. SMITH. I rose to ask the Senator if that conforms to just what was in the House provision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does, except that we have increased one foreman.

Mr. SMITH. It does not eliminate any of the fisheries which are now established?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not.

Mr. SMITH. That is all right.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 38 the House inserted a provision for the station at Key West, as follows:

Key West (Fla.) Biological Station: Superintendent, $1,800; engineer, $1,000; laboratory aid, $900; fish-culturist, $900; two apprentice fish culturists, at $600 each; in all, $5,800.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Those are all provided for.

Mr. FLETCHER. Are all those included in the Senate committee amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They are.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether the committee had any hearings or investigated these matters, but my information is that these salaries are so low that the bureau finds it very difficult to obtain people to perform the duties of these different positions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bureau did not ask our committee for any increases.

Mr. FLETCHER. I had a communication from them not long since to the effect that they are having difficulty in keeping up the fish-cultural stations, and going on with the work at these stations, because the salaries are so low that they can not find competent men to take the positions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Apparently the department accepted the provision of the House, because they did not ask us for any increase.

Mr. FLETCHER. This amendment provides for all the various stations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does. I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 5, to increase the total appropriation for Department of Labor, from "$6,826,920" to "$6,972,320."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This completes the amendments of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the Bureau of Lighthouses requested any increases over the House provision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They did not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have made a good many inquiries with respect to aids to navigation, and the reply from the department has always been that they were short of funds. They recognized the merit of the matters presented, but stated that they did not have sufficient funds to supply the needed aids—lights, etc.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They did not ask for anything additional.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment to the provision relating to immigration, at the end of the provision on page 51. The amendment that I offer is to appropriate $100,000 for the fiscal year 1922—that is, for the present fiscal year. It is in the nature of a deficiency appropriation. I simply desire to call attention to it, and to say that the present conditions show the utter recklessness with which economies are made, some economies being the worst form of extravagance.

The appropriation for the Immigration Service was so inadequate that they will be obliged between now and the 1st of July to lay off most of the force by furloughing them for two weeks or a month at a time, and it will reduce it from a force which numbers only 1,200 men to from 400 to 700 officers.

The service is now inadequate, and this laying off of inspectors of immigration can have but one effect, an increase in the smuggling in of immigrants who are barred by the law, and an increase in the number of immigrants illicitly coming into the country.

I read an article in the New York Herald of Sunday last from which I wish to read just a few words because it expresses what has happened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think we can conclude the appropriation bill in a very few moments. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. I hope that will be done, because I think we can finish the bill, and when that is done I intend to move that the Senate go into open executive session to further consider the treaties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. I read from the New York Herald as follows:

In the face of positive information published by the New York Herald that thousands of undesirable aliens are being smuggled into the United States systematically in violation of the immigration laws, which since has been corroborated fully by Government reports, word was passed brazenly this week among the members of the smuggling fraternity up and down the southern Atlantic and Gulf coasts and along the Mexican and Canadian borders that "the lid is off" for the next four months. The word is correct.

At a time when the Federal immigration authorities admit that it is practically impossible for them to make any headway against the smuggling gangs, especially those who are operating from Cuba to the thousands of bays and inlets on the Florida coast, the Immigration Bureau of the Department of Labor has been forced to issue orders to lay off hundreds of inspectors between now and July 1 because of the restricted congressional appropriations.

Unless Congress acts immediately by passing a deficiency bill granting approximately $100,000 to the Immigration Bureau, between 400 and 700 men will be given two weeks' furlough every 30 days until the end of the fiscal year.

It is predicted in congressional circles that at least 10,000 alien immigrants denied admittance under the law will be able to slip into the United States. For each one of them the smuggling gangs that are operating small vessels or fast automobiles along the southern coasts and the borders will collect from $100 to $500.

The Immigration Bureau finds itself in the same position as the prohibition enforcement office at this time last year, when hundreds of enforcement agents had to be laid off for several months due to the lack of funds to pay salaries. The extent to which the immigration inspection force will be crippled by laying off between 400 and 700 men is shown by the fact that the total number of inspectors and field assistants is only about 1,200.

That is the case, Mr. President, and it is very serious. Of course Boston is one of the large immigration ports, and I have heard from there as well as from other points with regard to the situation. I do not say anything about the hardship to the men in the service, which is very great, but to break up the service and furlough inspectors, to take away the men from the smaller points, can result in nothing but the admittance illicitly of a large number of immigrants who ought to be excluded.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to ask the Senator if his information is not to the effect, and if it is not the natural result of the present law restricting immigration, that it is most difficult of administration now and more so now than ever before? In place of laying off men we ought to have an increased and more efficient force.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is absolutely right. The present law, instead of requiring a smaller force, requires a larger force. I refer to the regular force. The regular appropriation is altogether too small. This year the estimate is $4,050,000, while the bill allows $3,300,000, and here is this force, which is of the greatest service to the protection of the country, cut down in a perfectly stupid, ruthless way.

Mr. SMITH. The reason why I rose was that I have heard comments to the effect that since the law was enacted restricting the number of immigrants who could come in, placing it on a percentage basis, it has been easier of administration than heretofore, when, as a matter of fact, just the opposite is the truth of the situation, because now they are attempting to evade the law and come in, anyway. We need a greater and more efficient force to enforce our laws.

Mr. LODGE. We do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall make no objection to the amendment. I will say to the Senator that the same proposition is now pending before the Appropriations Committee in connection with the next deficiency bill. However, if we can take care of it on this bill it will meet a very critical situation. It is a situation that affects my own State very much, I know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand this is estimated for on the deficiency bill and we shall have to look into it when that bill comes before us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 51, after line 8, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

For the enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1922, $100,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he thinks the amount of $100,000 will give substantial relief. It seems to me to be rather a small amount to cover the entire situation.

Mr. LODGE. I took the figures $100,000 from the statement in the New York Herald. I have heard that they need $150,000, but if we can get $100,000 I think it will relieve the most critical part of the situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have a great deal of information from the Immigration Service in the State of Washington as to the demoralized condition of affairs in that State which has resulted from the furloughing of a part of the force. I ask my colleague, who is in charge of the bill, if he thinks it would not be well, as long as we are taking care of this matter, to be sure to get an amount that is sufficient for the immediate needs of the service?

Mr. LODGE. I would be glad to modify my amendment and make the amount $150,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. One word further. Particularly on the northwest border of the country is there need for an efficient immigration service. The labyrinth of boundary waters and the sparsely settled international line between the State of Washington and the Province of British Columbia make it extremely difficult to enforce the law there. I am informed that large numbers of orientals and other aliens who have no right to come in are coming in there.

Mr. LODGE. They are; they are being smuggled in. They are brought across into New England, too. It is a very serious situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I made a misstatement a moment ago when I said this had been estimated for. It has not been. The clerk of the committee advises me that the amendment introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], proposing to appropriate $150,000, is pending before the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the deficiency appropriation bill. I thought when I got the information that it was estimated for, but it seems that it has not been estimated for.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood it was estimated for to be put in the deficiency bill. Does the Senator know whether it has been before the Departments of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. LODGE. I wrote the Department of Labor and asked them to send in an estimate, but it has not yet been received. I hope the amendment may be agreed to and taken to conference at least and discussed there.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senator will leave it at $100,000, because there is no estimate for it. I understand there is an amendment now pending before the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the deficiency appropriation bill for the same amount.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is for $150,000 in the form of an amendment on the deficiency appropriation bill. The Senator from Massachusetts offered that amendment and it is pending before the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no estimate here at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand there is no estimate. I am not going to make a point of order against the amendment. If any other Senator desires to do so he may. The situation is very critical, and in order properly to take care of the situation I suggest that we make the amount $150,000. We can then consider it in conference. If we take care of it in this bill, we shall not have to take care of it in the deficiency appropriation bill. That is the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts has modified the amendment so as to make the amount $150,000.

Mr. LODGE. I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Washington in charge of the bill, in view of the less number of immigrants coming to the United States under the present law than came formerly, whether so large a sum is required for the administration of the law?

Mr. LODGE. It has been cut far below the estimate of the department. As the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] pointed out a few moments ago when the Senator from Utah was not here——

Mr. KING. I was attending a meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LODGE. The new law requires additional men. The service is perfectly inadequate now as a whole. The law is a very difficult one to enforce. Of course, the decreased number of immigrants represents the enforcement of the law, and that decrease is dependent on the way in which the law is enforced.

Mr. KING. I think I may say there have been a large number coming into the United States in violation of the law. A great many go to Cuba and Mexico from ports in Europe; and then they filter across the line, violating our law and the regulations.

Mr. LODGE. That is just the situation. For the next three or four months and until the 1st of July, of the 1,200 men in the service they are going to lay off from 400 to 700, who will be off all the time. Of course, they will shift the men. The same men will not bear the whole burden of being laid off. They will reduce their force in the neighborhood of 50 per cent in that way, and that means an utter lack of protection at the out-of-the-way points. On the northwest coast, where the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] described the situation, on the Florida coast and on the Canadian border, they will not have sufficient men to enforce the law. It is too small an amount. It is the kind of economy, as I said in the beginning, that is the worst kind of extravagance.

Mr. KING. It is going to be very difficult to enforce the law along those borders, because, as we know, a great many foreigners, among them bolsheviks and revolutionists, are coming from Russia, and they secretly enter the United States. Of course, we ought to appropriate whatever amount is necessary to properly enforce the law.

Mr. LODGE. I assure the Senator I would not ask for it if I did not know it was injuring the enforcement of the law very greatly not to have it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he get an estimate for this if it is possible.

Mr. LODGE. I have written for an estimate.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will have trouble in conference without an estimate. I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I have written for the estimate and hope to have it here to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 53, in line 26, strike out "8" and insert "12" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That not exceeding 12 per cent shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation of $2,000 each per annum and above that sum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That really complies with the other increases which we have made and I think it is a proper amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] I offer the following amendment, not as a committee amendment, but in his behalf. I will say that a supplemental estimate came down after the bill was reported from the committee and I have no objection to the amendment. We will take it to conference and consider it there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 27, after line 19, insert the following:

For repairs and improvements at Barnegat, in the State of New Jersey, including protection of site against erosion by the sea, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, to be immediately available and continue available until expended, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session for the purpose of taking up the four-power treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Caraway	Gooding	Jones, Wash.
Brandegee	Colt	Hale	Kellogg
Broussard	Culberson	Harris	Kendrick
Calder	Fletcher	Harrison	King
Cameron	Frelinghuysen	Heflin	Ladd
Capper	Glass	Johnson	Lenroot

Lodge	Norbeck	Ransdell	Sutherland
McCormick	Norris	Rawson	Swanson
McKellar	Oddie	Reed	Underwood
McKinley	Overman	Robinson	Walsh, Mont.
McNary	Page	Sheppard	Warren
Nelson	Phipps	Shields	Watson, Ga.
New	Pittman	Smith	Watson, Ind.
Newberry	Poindexter	Spencer	Willis
Nicholson	Pomerene	Stanley

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent because of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted at the end of article 1 of the four-power treaty, and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. At the end of article 1 of the treaty it is proposed to insert:

> Each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all other nations and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers. If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers claiming an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the proposed amendment, from the viewpoint of those who doubt whether the pending treaty in its present form will tend to conserve the peace of the world, is of the utmost importance. Under the treaty as presented to the Senate the parties to it agree not to take aggressive action against the rights of one another in the region of the Pacific Ocean. They also agree that if such rights of any of them are threatened by the aggressive action of any outside power they will pursue a definite course in regard to the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator from Arkansas does not wish to state it too broadly, and I desire to call his attention to the fact that the rights referred to are simply the rights in reference to their insular possessions.

Mr. ROBINSON. And their insular dominions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And their insular dominions.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator himself states the matter too narrowly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have referred to the treaty as pertaining to the rights in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But that might mean continental rights.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the obligation of both article 1 and article 2 of the treaty relates to insular rights and insular possessions. I shall have occasion during the course of my remarks to discuss the relationship which this treaty bears to the Asiatic mainland and to the very acute controversies that exist there growing out of the aggression by Japan against Siberia and China. The purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to fill a vital and inexcusable omission in the treaty. If the signatories to the four-power pact expect to hold their insular rights and insular dominions secure against the aggression of any other power, they must refrain from acts of aggression not only in the region of the Pacific but upon the Asiatic mainland and elsewhere.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds further with his argument, I should like his view upon this thought: We have already been informed by the leading Senators who have charge of the pending treaty that they consider the Anglo-Japanese treaty a menace to our interest and our peace. If we get rid of the Anglo-Japanese treaty by the pending treaty, will not the other nations consider the four-power treaty a menace to them?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is no doubt in my mind that Great Britain and Japan and probably other nations construe the four-power pact as an alliance; and I shall demonstrate to such Senators as do me the honor to listen to what I have to say that this conclusion is inevitable from the statements made at the plenary session of the Washington conference when the four-power treaty was presented.

There is no use concealing well-known facts. Nothing can be accomplished by mincing words. The only menace which the United States now faces, either in the region of the Pacific Ocean or elsewhere, is that which arises from its relationship to the Empire of Japan and the policies which that Empire has put into practice respecting the mainland of Asia. Any remedy, then, which is intended to avert conflict or to adjust controversies must take cognizance of the fact that the object of the United States in entering any combination with any other nation is to avoid conflicts, secure her rights and the rights of her nationals, and to see that no injustice is done through her action or acquiescence to any other power.

Those who believe that as a result of the very affable proceedings conducted at the Washington conference the nations affected by this treaty have lost or abandoned all disposition to extend by economic penetration and political intrigue, supported by military power, their dominion over the territories and peoples of other nations friendly to the United States, may say no necessity exists for such an amendment, because the nations have become so righteous that hereafter they will prove themselves incapable of injustice. If you want to save the future from embarrassing complications, if you intend to do justice to China and Russia, if in fact Japan is ready to reverse her policy of aggression and to refrain from it in the future, why not make it clear in this treaty?

The four-power treaty is advanced by its advocates as the greatest achievement of modern times for the preservation of world peace.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, that was the claim before the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] admitted yesterday that it was a cipher.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was just proceeding to show that the Senator from Massachusetts made that claim. I can quote his language. He said:

> If the four-power treaty be rejected, the Washington conference will fail.

He said, in substance, that if it be rejected the Senate would blight or wither the new hope of the world for peace.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought he was merely quoting Woodrow Wilson's speech. I did not know that he was claiming that as original.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, to the amazement of Senators who heard him, the Senator from Massachusetts was putting the four-power treaty in the same relationship to human affairs, the adjustment of international controversies, and the preservation of world peace that Woodrow Wilson placed the League of Nations; and, consciously or unconsciously, he made a poor paraphrase of the language that Woodrow Wilson used.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think the technical term is "unconscious cerebration." I believe that is the way that process is described.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think, if the Senator will permit me, that the word is "plagiarism," and not "paraphrase."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is a great scholar and a great statesman. He admits it. He is perhaps the most experienced man in the Senate of the United States touching international relations. During the last few years he has been on more sides of many subjects than any other intellectual gymnast I have ever known. In numerous speeches before the issue had developed to a specific treaty he declared himself for a League of Nations—just such a league as was afterwards presented. With eloquence and forcefulness he reversed his attitude on that subject and denounced the league as an instrument of oppression, inevitably to become subversive of the rights of the United States and of the liberties of her citizens. He denounced the Colombian treaty, when first presented to the Senate, as an outrage. Its ratification was characterized as an act of perfidy approaching bribery. With characteristic speed, he reversed that attitude and insisted on ratification of the treaty, and the prompt payment of the "bribe" which had already been too long delayed; and now he brings to the Senate a treaty upon the ratification of which, he says, depends the future peace of the world.

I think I am open to conviction. I want to conserve world peace. I do not desire or intend that any political considerations or any other considerations shall prevent me from discharging my duties here, from speaking and voting in what seems to be the best interests of this Nation and the happiness and security of its people. The moment I become convinced that the four-power treaty means peace to the United States and security to her rights and citizens, I will gladly join the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in an effort to ratify it. The function of advising and consenting to the ratification of treaties was vested in the Senate of the United States for an important purpose. In view of the fact that this treaty was negotiated in part by Senators who in its negotiation committed themselves to the manner in which they should discharge their constitutional function of advising and consenting to the treaty, it becomes of the utmost importance that other Senators who are not so committed shall exercise their conscientious and independent judgment.

After having said that the treaty is of the utmost importance, the Senator from Massachusetts, in order to escape the force of the argument that it imposed upon this Government important obligations and new responsibilities and duties, committed an act of inconsistency which has not often characterized even his remarkable record for inconsistency. There is not a Senator hearing me who will not recall that the burden of the Senator's speech delivered on yesterday, when he reached the discussion of the terms of the treaty, was to show that it imposed no obligation on any member except the duty of taking part in a conference. If that be true, how can it be said by any intelligent man that the treaty is important to the future peace of the world?

Mr. President, if the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts be accepted that the treaty is only an undertaking in which the four powers who are parties to it bind themselves only to confer in case of threatened trouble, it is inconsistent, it is hypocritical to assert that such a treaty can bear any important relationship to the future peace of the world. If, when war becomes imminent, the nations in this compact are only to talk, if there is no obligation either legal or moral to decide what shall be done and then to do it, how can a great statesman like the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his poetic fancies and indulge in dreams that this treaty is inseparably connected with the future fate of mankind?

When he answers the argument that we will be bound by the treaty to grave and weighty responsibilities by saying that there are none, and that the most the treaty provides for is conversation, he proves better than anything I can say the incorrectness of his conclusion that the treaty is a great document. If the four-power treaty is the principal result and accomplishment of the Washington conference, and if it merely calls for conference in case of pending trouble, then the Washington conference failed when it negotiated that treaty, and the failure does not occur here when it is rejected. How can anyone escape that conclusion?

Sirs, I have no sympathy with the declaration that in this treaty the United States merely agrees to hold a friendly conference with France, Great Britain, and Japan if the insular rights and dominions of any one of them are assailed or threatened, or if a difficulty arises between any two of them. I propose to prove, by giving the language employed its ordinary meaning in diplomacy, that the four-power treaty is an alliance, and if it is not an alliance, it is nothing worth while.

Article 1 provides, in substance, that if any controversy arises among the high contracting parties which is not settled by diplomacy, all the parties to the compact will be invited to a conference to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration and adjustment. The contemplation of the framers of this treaty was that the conference may be able to find a settlement for any difficulty which may arise between any of the parties to the treaty. No method whatever was suggested or provided in the treaty by which the settlement should be actually made if the conference failed to effect an adjustment.

Singularly, there were excluded by a declaration attached to the treaty, and signed by all the signatories, all domestic controversies. If the procedure under the treaty is merely intended to bring about a conference for the peaceful settlement of disputes, and if in no instance can it go to the extent of imposing any liability or obligation, why were domestic problems excluded from the conference?

We all know that the real trouble which has existed between the United States and Japan has arisen out of three principal subject matters, in so far as domestic affairs are concerned: First, immigration; second, so-called race equality; and, third, to the claim of the Japanese to the right of land ownership. The last controversy has proved peculiarly vexing as respects the people who live in the States along the Pacific seaboard. It has caused disputes between Japan and the United States for the last quarter of a century.

The Washington conference reports a treaty which, it says, settles all difficulties likely to cause trouble between the United States and other signatories to that treaty, and yet expressly reserves from the treaty the real causes likely to result in conflict.

I can understand why those were actually reserved. The United States was unwilling, Japan, perhaps, was not anxious, to submit purely domestic questions to the arbitrament of France and England; but if there is no power to decide and take action, what is the objection to talking about them in the conference? What objection is there to availing ourselves of the friendly offices of France and Great Britain in an effort to adjust these difficulties? The real reason why those reservations were made is that if immigration, land ownership, and kindred questions were submitted to such a conference as this treaty contemplates that conference would have the power to adjust them, and if no agreement resulted France, England, and Japan would be bound under the Versailles treaty, to which they are all parties, to take the controversy to the League of Nations council. Any nation refusing to abide the decision of the league would incur the antagonism of all members of the league and be subjected to the economic boycott and, perhaps, to war.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I inquire if the Senator's construction of this treaty is that without the reservation under article 1 the Japanese immigration question could have been taken cognizance of by the four powers, and could have been adjusted under this treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not go to the extent to say that such a question would have been comprehended within the jurisdiction of the conference unless it grew out of a dispute relating to the insular rights or insular possessions of the parties. If there had been no such reservation and a dispute as to immigration, land ownership, or race equality had arisen touching one of the islands which the United States owns, or one of the islands which Japan owns, without this reservation unquestionably it would have been subject to the jurisdiction of the conference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Evidently, then, the treaty was written with the design originally of putting the Japanese immigration question within the jurisdiction of the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I can not say what the original intention of the framers of this treaty was. I have been trying in every way my humble mind can conceive to find out. I have looked for information in the printed records. I have asked for it from everyone who ought to know, and I have learned nothing. The Senator from California may have had better success than I have had.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; all information has been denied us, just exactly as it has been denied the Senator from Arkansas. It is denied, too, not only to us, but it is denied to the American people, who are entitled to it, after all.

But returning to the question I put to the Senator, apparently, in the minds of those who wrote this treaty, or of those who executed it, one of them being in the Chamber now, there must have been a question of the right of those who executed the treaty, under the treaty, to take into their jurisdiction the Japanese immigration and other domestic questions. That being in the minds of those who executed this treaty on our part, they, perhaps to make assurance doubly sure, as they may say, or perhaps because it was absolutely essential, wrote the reservation providing that the controversies which are mentioned shall not embrace the domestic questions of this country, or substantially that.

If, under the original treaty, the design and the purpose were to embrace domestic questions, I wonder if the Senator from Arkansas can suggest who wrote this treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I was going to discuss that question, and perhaps I might just as well anticipate the discussion and answer the question now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not want to interfere with the orderly procedure of the Senator's argument.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator; I am not complaining in the least. I do not know who wrote this treaty; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] being unavoidably absent, I ask the Senator from Alabama now to tell us who wrote this treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield to me, I will attempt to tell him.

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can say to the Senator that I am not as well informed about this treaty, and all the details of it, as I am about some of the other treaties before the conference, because in the midst of the negotiations in relation to this treaty I was called out of Washington on account of a death in my family, and the negotiations proceeded, of course, while I was gone; but I will be glad to tell the Senator all I know about it, which is not all that occurred, of course, as I was absent for more than a week.

When the American delegation first met, the proposition of our reducing naval armaments in accordance with the instructions of Congress raised the question of the effect of the Anglo-Japanese alliance on the navies if our proposals were to be accepted; and they were substantially accepted. The discussion then was as to whether or not the Anglo-Japanese alliance could be avoided, and it was left to the chairman of our delegation to take the question up with the chairmen of the delegations from Great Britain and from Japan, to see whether they would consider the question of the cancellation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That ran along for some time, and during that discussion there was no discussion of anything taking place.

Then the chairman of the American delegation reported to the American delegation that he thought an agreement could be reached by which the Anglo-Japanese alliance would be canceled provided something could be put in its place. Of course, what I know about it came to me second hand, because I did not engage in the negotiations. The negotiations were carried on by the Secretary of State.

The American delegation then were told that Great Britain was not prepared to cancel the Anglo-Japanese alliance without something put in its place, because Australia and New Zealand thought that the alliance was of some value to them and they wanted an agreement by at least three powers—the United States, Great Britain, and Japan—in substitution of the alliance which was to be canceled.

I think there was some little discussion in the delegation about the form of that new agreement before I left, but I do not recall the exact terms if there were any such discussions.

When I came back to Washington I was informed by the chairman of the American delegation that they had reached an agreement, and he stated what the agreement was, which is the present treaty without the subsequent understanding or the subsequent treaty that was signed. He explained at that time that it included the home islands of Japan, and asked me whether it would meet with my approval. After investigating the matter, I agreed to the treaty.

I can not say to the Senator what the facts were that led up to it because I was not here. I have given him all the information that I have. I have heard it said that there were some other drafts of the treaty. That may or may not be so. I did not see any, but I was absent from the city during the time and they may have been presented to the delegation during that time.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Alabama the other day in discussing the treaty said that we ought not to look a gift horse in the mouth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not then discussing this treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. That had reference to the treaty with regard to the island of Yap.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. We have all these things grouped in our minds, and should. Anyhow, the Senator, alluding to Japan, said we ought not to look a gift horse in the mouth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was referring to the island of Yap treaty.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator think we ought to ratify any treaty that puts us in the attitude of taking gifts from Japan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that regarding this treaty. I have no more objection myself to taking gifts from Japan than I would to taking them from England or France. As I called to the attention of the Senator the other day, one of the notable instances where we have taken gifts from Great Britain, in the sense of a concession, was in reference to the Canadian fisheries rights. But we have given to other nations and they have yielded to us in the past. Within proper lines, when it comes within high national morals, I have no objection in the world, as I had none to accepting the concession that Japan made to the nationals of the United States in reference to their cable landing in the island of Yap. But there is no concession of that kind in this treaty; it is all mutual.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. In the case of the fisheries, did we not base our claim upon prescription?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but as the Senator knows as well as I do, because there are very few men in the Senate so well informed on historic facts, when we signed the treaty of Ghent closing the war of 1812–1814, we yielded the prescription that we claimed when the Revolutionary War closed.

Of course, if I can inform the Senator from Arkansas with reference to anything further within my knowledge, I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not care to yap any more about Yap now. I asked the Senator from Alabama, as one of the four representatives of the American Government in the Washington conference, who wrote the four-power treaty. Newspaper correspondents up in the press gallery have been trying to find out who wrote this treaty ever since it was brought before the plenary session of the Washington conference by the Senator from Massachusetts. When they send out their stories this evening I ask that they write the answer of the Senator from Alabama to my question, Who wrote the four-power treaty? I know the Senator from Alabama has given all the information that he has on the subject. He is a great man, a good man, and a true man, but he is not in possession of the information. He does not know, but he confirms the conclusion that I had reached upon the proceedings of the conference of the manner in which this treaty was put forward.

The four-power treaty originated with Mr. Balfour, now Sir Arthur, and he had the concurrence, the hearty concurrence, of those brilliant, astute, indomitable, all-knowing representatives of the Japanese Empire, Prince Tokugawa and T. Kato.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me conclusive that the American delegation did not write the treaty or have anything to do with it. No American delegation would have written the treaty and asked the American people to include the homeland of Japan. It is a certainty that the nation which wrote it or dictated it had a different object in view than that which the American delegates would have had on that subject.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not only is that true, but the proceedings of the negotiators who conceived and framed the treaty were kept secret from the press, from the American people, and from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], one of the representatives of the American Government. On the day that the Senator from Massachusetts gave out the first statement of the prospective terms, which ultimately entered into this proposal, Secretary of State Hughes said to men sitting in the gallery now, representing the press of the United States, that no such proposal as the four-power treaty was in contemplation. He declared that he knew nothing of the matter. I am speaking what I know to be true. The Senator from Massachusetts, acting as an American delegate, gave a statement of the four-power treaty to a reliable newspaper man, whose word every Senator would accept, and at the same time Secretary Hughes was telling a group of newspaper men, who had heard a rumor that the treaty was to be forthcoming, that no such treaty was in contemplation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is there any evidence, however, that the Senator from Massachusetts had read the draft when he gave it out?

Mr. ROBINSON. I can not answer that. If the Senator from Massachusetts, who informed me that he was unavoidably called from the Chamber and who I am satisfied is unable to be here, were now present, I would ask him the questions I have asked the Senator from Alabama. But I do not think the Senate would derive any more information than was obtained from the answers of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I read very carefully the first draft handed out, alluded to by the Senator from Arkansas, and saw that one word was used in three different senses in that short document. Therefore I knew that the Senator from Massachusetts had not written it or read it.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is absolutely conclusive proof that he had not written it, and persuasive that he had not read it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Speaking of the matter in a serious way, is it not about as remarkable a thing as the Senator ever heard of that the representatives of the United States Government, in considering the draft of the treaty which involved the right of the United States to fortify its own possessions and which yielded to Japan the complete dominance over thousands of islands and did other things of an equally important character, never even inquired when the document came to them who prepared that document or where it came from? Is not that about the most remarkable thing the Senator ever heard of?

Mr. ROBINSON. It is incomprehensible to my mind.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I call to the Senator's attention that in the very illuminating statement of the Senator from Alabama about what transpired, not a single word was said by him in response to the query that was put as to how this particular reservation, which is the first reservation to the treaty, was written into it? I beg the Senator to keep in mind that the first reservation to the treaty was written into it by the treaty makers themselves, because they did not understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON. There were two reservations written into it. I would not say it was because they did not understand it, but I would like to have somebody who knows explain why they did not incorporate in the treaty any statement they desired to make, and why they resorted to what we term reservations in order to make clear their own language.

But I do not want to be diverted now, if the Senator will pardon me, from the subject of who is responsible for the conception of the treaty, because I think it bears upon the true or, at least, practical interpretation that will be given it by the nations of the world and bears forcefully upon the effect which the treaty will have on world affairs.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in a burst of enthusiasm rhetorical beyond my powers to follow him, referred to the fact that one of the sublime benefits of this treaty is that it rids the United States of the menace of the Anglo-Japanese treaty.

Mr. President, in the beginning of my remarks I proposed to show that this treaty does not contemplate a mere conference for discussion, but that it contemplates a defensive alliance. I am going to call two witnesses and repeat the substance of their statements to the Washington conference when the four-power pact was reported by the Senator from Massachusetts.

There is not any doubt in my mind that the British Government and Japan regard the four-power pact as a substitute for the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The first reason that I assign for that conclusion is the statement made by Mr. Balfour, now Sir Arthur Balfour, in the Washington conference amid enthusiastic cheers, the fluttering of fans, and the display of costly millinery. The declaration by Mr. Balfour was that the British Government and Japan could not rescind the Anglo-Japanese alliance until something equally effective should be substituted in its place, and that the four-power treaty measured that test.

I do not have to look at the record. I was present, I heard and saw what happened there. The Senator from Massachusetts appeared and was graciously received by his audience. Many of his colleagues, including myself, felt a sense of pride in the prominence that he enjoyed, in the service that he had an opportunity to render to his country and to mankind. We awaited his utterances with eagerness and anxiety. It had been rumored that he was to make a great speech. We knew if he spoke he would make a great speech. He always does. The stage was set, the instruments tuned, the lights were on for a thrilling if not a dramatic performance.

The Senator from Massachusetts then informed his audience that in some mysterious regard this four-power treaty which he read was a great document inseparably linked with the fate and destiny of mankind. He proceeded to tell us that the islands to which it related and the territory which it affected were of little importance and were not destined to be of greater consequence in the future. He indulged in beautiful and meaningless poetry. He did not attempt to construe this treaty or to state its meaning and application in important controversies, but leaped to the conclusion that it was a masterful and far-reaching achievement, destined to make glorious the names and nations of those who had contributed to its conception and preparation.

When he had concluded and the sounds of applause had died away, Mr. Balfour, now Sir Arthur Balfour, arose in his benignant, benevolent way and thrilled and stirred the audience not beyond my power to recall, but beyond my power to describe. He said that he was the head of the British Government when the Anglo-Japanese treaty had been negotiated. He declared that by chance he was also the head of the British Government when the entente with France was arranged, and in language which no one who heard can forget he declared that the Anglo-Japanese alliance had stood the strain of war and had been the means of securing victory and triumph for Japan and Great Britain in more than one mighty conflict.

He declared that when the Anglo-Japanese alliance was framed it was not in his thought that that agreement should affect the interests of the United States, but that evil persons had conceived the erroneous thought; that the arrangement between Japan and Great Britain, known as the Anglo-Japanese alliance, by which they were to stand side by side, make common friends and fight common foes, had so endeared the two peoples to each other that, even though the necessity for the alliance may have passed, they could not be induced to rescind or abandon it and part company one from the other—Japan from Great Britain—unless something new which would be equally effective was substituted in its place. That is the language that Mr. Balfour used, and I have not the slightest doubt, then, that it was his brain which conceived and Prince Tokugawa's hand which wrote the four-power pact about which so little is known by the American delegation. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts now who wrote the four-power pact and who wrote the reservations which were reported with it?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the articles of the four-power pact were written by many hands.

Mr. ROBINSON. How many?

Mr. LODGE. Well, there were four at least.

Mr. ROBINSON. Who were the four?

Mr. LODGE. The heads of the four delegations, and, perhaps, some of the delegates. There were suggestions made and the drafts were amended and redrafted.

Mr. ROBINSON. How many drafts were made?

Mr. LODGE. I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. What?

Mr. LODGE. I can not tell how many drafts were made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Who made those drafts?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know.

Mr. ROBINSON. Who proposed that the four-power pact should be entered into as a substitute for the Anglo-Japanese alliance?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know who made the first proposition. I know the American delegates did at one time, but whether they were the first I can not tell.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I can tell who drafted the declarations.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator means what I have termed reservations?

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean the supplementary treaty, but the reservations in the form of declarations. They were drawn by the Secretary of State.

Mr. ROBINSON. Was that because the Secretary of State thought that unless reservation No. 2 was incorporated the conference would take jurisdiction of domestic questions?

Mr. LODGE. He did not think the reservations were necessary, but thought it wise to put them in, so that there could be no possible misunderstanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, we have learned that many hands, unidentified, contributed to the preparation of this document.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood the Senator from Massachusetts—not to the preparation, but merely to the drafting. Who wrote the first copy the Senator from Massachusetts has no knowledge.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; we do not know that and will never find out.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not want my colleague to misrepresent the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROBINSON. We will never find out from any authentic source, but it is incomprehensible to me that the Senator from Massachusetts should be unable to answer more definitely than he has answered. The Senate heard the answer of the Senator from Alabama, which gave even less information than the reply of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senator from Arkansas to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. When the draft was made or worked over was the Anglo-Japanese treaty before those who were drawing the four-power pact, or working it over?

Mr. LODGE. Of course; it was before the world.

Mr. REED. Of course, it was before the world, but——

Mr. LODGE. As I stated yesterday, it had been the subject of conversations, and I thought also of correspondence. I knew that it had been the subject of conversations between the Secretary of State and the British Government during the summer even before the conference was called.

Mr. REED. My reason for asking the question was I wondered who it was who copied into the four-power treaty whole sentences out of the Japanese-English treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Anglo-Japanese alliance!

Mr. LODGE. I do not know that anybody did, and I can not tell the Senator. There were various drafts, and they were much changed and amended.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is a fact that if you compare the language of the Anglo-Japanese alliance with the terms of the four-power pact you will know at once that the person who actually wrote the four-power pact either was so familiar with the Anglo-Japanese alliance that he remembered the phrases and sentences in it, or had before him a copy of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly the same man wrote them both, and he would naturally follow the same language.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that Sir Arthur suggested it, but did not soil his hands with the difficult and arduous task of actually preparing it. He had more important duties to perform.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the speech which Mr. Balfour made before the conference he stated that some years ago, I think while he was prime minister of England, he had written the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been through all of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON. I quoted from memory Sir Arthur Balfour's speech, and if the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator thinks my memory is not accurate, recourse can be had to the record.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not mean that I have quoted the exact language of it.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I understand that. I was not going to correct that; but as to the making of the original Anglo-Japanese alliance, I suggest that the Senator from Tennessee—and perhaps the Senator from Arkansas has not seen it—read the account given by Baron Hayashi, who was the Japanese ambassador to England, who thought he had something to do with making it. The account is very elaborately given in his memoirs, the different things suggested, and so on.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, I care nothing about that. It is not important.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it is at all important, but the Senator from Tennessee raised the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to pursue my line of discussion. It does not matter who actually wrote the Anglo-Japanese alliance or who actually drafted the four-power pact so much as who conceived it, who proposed it, who promoted it, who secured its adoption. Sir Arthur took large responsibility for both. When Mr. Balfour and others had addressed the conference on the day that the Senator from Massachusetts reported to it the four-power treaty, a very modest-appearing gentleman arose from among the seats assigned to the Japanese Empire at the conference table and delivered a few brief sentences, the most significant one of which was:

> All Japan rejoices in this day's accomplishment.

Why should she not rejoice? In her conception and in the belief of Mr. Balfour, Great Britain and Japan were being relieved of the embarrassments incident to the Anglo-Japanese alliance by the substitution for it of a quadruple alliance in which France and the United States joined with Great Britain and Japan.

To those who say that the obligations under this treaty terminate when a conference has been held, I address myself immediately. Article 2 provides that if these rights—meaning insular rights and dominions—are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties will first communicate with one another fully and frankly, but the article does not end there. It binds them to do something. What is that obligation to be performed in the conference? It is to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to meet the exigencies of the situation. When the representative of the United States Government enters a conference called by any one of these three powers under a threat of aggression against these insular rights and dominions, he will be bound to seek to arrive at an understanding. To what does the understanding relate? The most efficient measures to be taken to meet the exigencies of the particular situation. Force will be met with force.

Let us suppose a case not unlikely to arise. Russia, recuperating, seeks to expel Japan from the mainland or from the northern half of Sakhalin. She or her allies attack Formosa or Sakhalin, and Japan sends out the S O S, and the United States, Great Britain, and France, in response to their undertaking, send their representatives to a conference.

Japan says, "Russia will recapture Sakhalin unless I resist it immediately with military or naval force, and while I am resisting Russia along the far-stretched Asiatic coast and on Sakhalin, Russia's allies will be striking anywhere and everywhere they can. The Empire is endangered. What shall I do? Fight! Call to arms in defense of the Empire every brown man who is loyal to the Japanese flag! But China and Russia and Germany threaten to overrun me. What measures shall we take?"

England says, "If Japan is conquered, my Empire is gone, and my far-spread possessions will pass from under the dominion of the British flag. England stands by her ally, Japan."

"Where is France?"

France replies, "I, too, have had alliances with Japan. I, too, have had arrangements long unknown to the United States and to the rest of mankind by which in the hour of extreme peril, when Germany was threatening to overrun civilization, Japan performed a part in stemming the tide of conflict against the Allies; and now, in repayment of that obligation, the tricolor of France is planted by the flag of the rising sun."

"Where is the United States?"

What will be your answer? Is there any Senator who thinks that duty or obligation will have been finally discharged under this treaty when the United States has had a conversation with Japan, Great Britain, and France around a conference table? The conference will decide what measures shall be taken and how the measures adopted shall be executed, whether jointly or separately.

Mr. President, some moments ago I spoke of the domestic controversies which heretofore have threatened to disturb peace between Japan and the United States. Let me turn now, for a moment only, to discuss some of the foreign questions relating to Japan, which have occasioned interest in the minds and hearts of the people of the United States.

We have not felt particularly concerned about maintaining the status quo of the islands in the Pacific Ocean. Our disputes with Japan, if I may call them disputes, have arisen out of questions affecting the Asiatic mainland. The foreign questions which have interested the United States arise out of the manner in which Japan has dealt with Korea, Shantung, Manchuria, the Chinese Eastern Railway, and Siberia. Japanese aggression in these spheres has been marked by political intrigue and economic penetration, supported always by military control. The United States throughout her history has had every reason to be friendly to both China and Russia, and has heretofore protested every insidious advance of Japan against them. The four-power treaty not only fails to guarantee a reversal of the Japanese policy, but strongly tends to commit the United States to a passive attitude, and to block our opportunity for securing fairness and justice in the dealings of Japan with China and Siberia. Russia like a great bear lies wounded, bleeding, famishing, her enemies striking from every side. Her friends have disappeared. But Russia will not always be stricken. She will not long continue helpless. When she rises to assert her rights, she may be compelled to attack Japan in order to expel Japanese invaders. How shameful, then, would be the position of the United States, bound by this treaty to give moral if not military support to Japan in her conflict with Russia!

Mr. President, China has been asleep for centuries. One day she is going to awake. When China awakens she and Japan will, indeed, constitute a yellow peril. This Government refused to enter into a combination dominated by white nations for the preservation of the peace of the world on the theory that it would constitute an entangling alliance. What, then, shall be said of this four-power treaty which, if it accomplishes anything, binds the United States, France, and Great Britain to the establishment and maintenance of Japanese supremacy and control throughout the Orient?

You may answer that the days of wars have ended and that the control of the earth through conferences has come, but, Mr. President, make no mistake. If ever the time may be hoped for when men will learn to do better than to destroy each other in the savagery of war, that day is far distant. I recall some sentences from a speech made by Gov. Black when he nominated Theodore Roosevelt for President. He said:

> The fate of nations is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees. You may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life. You may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, still out in the smoke and the thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come to abide forever on this earth only when the dreams of childhood shall become the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.
> Events are numberless and mighty, and no man can tell which wire runs round the world. The nations basking in contentment and repose to-day may still be on the deadly circuit and to-morrow writhing in the toils of war.

I hope and pray for peace through justice in international affairs, but advance toward that blissful end is slow and difficult.

If ever the day shall dawn when men shall lay down their arms and settle their disputes in peace, the millennium will be at hand; but that day is distant. It is not in sight. Militarism or imperialism dominates the Governments of Europe and of Asia.

We are asked now by another treaty related to this to enter into a compact by which we will relinquish our right to fortify the islands we own in the Pacific Ocean. It is true that that provision is not in the pending treaty, but it follows that if the four-power treaty is ratified the naval arms limitation treaty shall be ratified.

I have hoped and I still hope to find myself in a position to support that treaty, but I can not forget that by the terms of the four-power treaty and the naval arms limitation treaty we are leaving the Philippine Islands at the mercy of Japan. If Japan keeps faith with us—as she has not done with Russia, China, or any other nation in modern times that I can recall, save in her alliance with Great Britain—if she respects our rights and refrains from aggressions against other nations, there will be no occasion for war; but if we surrender our right to fortify Guam and the Philippine Islands, what will be the result? Japan, with the acquiescence of Great Britain, can dominate the Pacific and the Orient, and the United States will be restrained from serious protest through fear for the safety of her own possessions in the Pacific Ocean. Think of it! No consideration given by the American delegates to the conference to strategic considerations.

In the North Sea, commanding the approach to the Elbe and the Weser, lies the rocky, barren island of Helgoland. In 1807, if I recall correctly, Great Britain wrested Helgoland from Denmark, who ceded it to her seven years later. In 1892, without taking thought of the strategic consequence, Great Britain ceded Helgoland to Germany, and Helgoland and her fortifications became a controlling factor in the World War, in which Germany fought so long and so persistently for the destruction of commerce on all the seas.

If Guam be not fortified and Japan ever conceives the idea that she desires to do so, she can take Guam within a few days and she can advance to the Philippine Islands and capture them within a week or 10 days and humiliate and destroy the power of the United States in the Pacific.

I know Senators are saying that I am anticipating a calamity which may never come. I pray God that it may never come, but I am not willing yet to put the United States, her flag, her people, and her commerce at the mercy of any other nation or any other people on this earth.

When the war broke in fury in 1914, a protest resounded from end to end of this continent against this Government for having failed to prepare herself for war. There is a reaction now. We all want to escape the burdens of militarism, but I ask is it safe to rely on Great Britain for naval protection?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I remind the Senator from Arkansas that when Lord Salisbury was proposing in the English Parliament to cede Helgoland to Germany, he was warned of the danger of doing that, just as the Senator from Arkansas is now warning the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and Lord Salisbury laughed the warning scornfully aside, just as the Senator from Massachusetts is laughing our warnings scornfully aside.

Mr. ROBINSON. Our duty, of course, is to safeguard from seizure by any other power the possessions of the United States. Is it wise to overlook the strategic importance of strong fortifications on Guam and in the Philippines and the necessity for naval bases in the Pacific regions?

At the close of the war the people of the United States were so heavily taxed that they wanted to get rid of military burdens. They were willing to go to very great extremes to secure disarmament. The Washington conference, called primarily for the purpose of securing an agreement for naval disarmament, converted itself into an organization for the establishment of a new alliance to control affairs in the Pacific Ocean and in the Orient. I am willing to go as far as any Senator will go for disarmament. I am not willing now and shall not be at any other time to place the possessions of the United States at the mercy of any foreign power.

That great Massachusetts statesman, Samuel W. McCall, said in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, to which I shall refer again when occasion offers, that this treaty is an alliance pure and simple. He said, in substance:

> If you refuse to give it that effect, you condemn it as feeble and useless.

Such will be the construction which future events will place upon the instrument which we are asked to ratify.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the first article of the treaty.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Massachusetts want to press this matter this afternoon?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I would like to go on and have it debated, or have a vote taken. The question comes on the first article, I believe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has offered an amendment to article 1.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware of that. I was not in the Chamber when that was done. Of course, then, the question is on the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are attending a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FLETCHER. My colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senator have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to speak on the treaty, who are preparing their remarks. I have appealed privately to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to let the treaty go over. I think the Senate would gain time by doing that.

The Senator from Massachusetts yesterday for the first time gave his views on the treaty. In the natural course, we would have expected him to address the Senate when the treaty was first called for consideration in order that the Senate might have the benefit of his knowledge regarding the making of the treaty, and his views as to its import. Having delivered himself of such speech, we might well have expected a reasonable time in which to digest his observations and facts. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who was appointed on this commission along with the Senator from Massachusetts, and presumptively appointed to in a sense represent the Senate, has not given us the benefit of his observations yet. It seems to me, therefore, that it is out of all order to insist that the Members of the Senate shall discuss the treaty when those two Senators who have helped frame it have not yet spoken.

This is obviously all the more true, because the treaty received but slight consideration in the Committee on Foreign Relations. No witnesses were called. No hearings were had. No exposition was made of the effect of the treaty. I am credibly informed that officers high in the Navy have expressed views which, if they were laid before the Senate in an official way, would do much to enlighten the Senate and possibly directly affect the votes of Members; but those officers have not been called. Indeed, we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts that the strategic importance of the islands in the Pacific was not even considered, no attention paid to that importance, none given to that vital question. Under these circumstances, therefore, those who want to discuss the treaty must search for their own facts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me? I made that remark in regard to the island of Sakhalin and in regard to this treaty. I did not say that the strategic value or importance of islands covered by the naval treaty was not considered.

Mr. REED. They could not have been considered with reference to any of these treaties unless they were considered with reference to all of them.

Mr. LODGE. Well, they were, as a matter of fact, considered in reference to the naval treaty, but there was no consideration given to the strategic value of the islands in connection with this treaty. This treaty did not concern the Navy.

Mr. REED. All the treaties were being considered together, and I asked the Senator yesterday if there had been any consideration given to the strategic value of these islands. The Senator said they were dealing with questions of peace and not with questions of war, and they had given no consideration to the matter of their strategic value.

Mr. LODGE. Unless I am very much mistaken, the Senator referred yesterday to the island of Sakhalin, and I said its strategic value had not been considered in connection with this treaty, and I repeat it.

Mr. REED. Very well, and yet it will in all probability be drenched in blood within a very short time.

Mr. LODGE. I dare say. The Senator knows the future far better than I do.

Mr. REED. No; I do not know it better than the Senator does, but I know it quite as well.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows it perfectly well.

Mr. REED. In so far as anyone can know anything about it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows as much as I do about it, and I know nothing. I do not pretend to read the future.

Mr. REED. Except as we may judge the future by the past. The Senator has been dealing with the future, and it is for wise men to look into the future as far as they can, and they can only judge the future by the past and the present. The Senator can not properly make a treaty that has to do with the future and employ the slightest degree of common sense in making it unless he considers the results which may flow from existing conditions. The Senator expressly said that had not been done with reference to the island of Sakhalin.

Mr. LODGE. The island of Sakhalin, with reference to which the Senator inquired, was not considered in any way in connection with its strategic value. As to its being drenched in blood in a few years, that is something I know nothing about, and I do not think anybody knows anything about it.

If the Senator will permit me, I took occasion to examine the map after I had spoken here and found what I thought to be the case, that the island of Sakhalin is very distant from Vladivostok. The nearest point to Vladivostok is the main island of Japan.

Mr. REED. It is not so distant.

Mr. LODGE. It is the last place from which anybody would think of attacking Vladivostok.

Mr. REED. I am glad to have the Senator's opinion as a military expert and to know that as a result of these talks he has finally looked at the map and located the island.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I have looked at the map a great many times and studied it. I frankly say that I did not realize the great distance of Sakhalin from Vladivostok. I knew it lay along the coast of Siberia, of course. Everybody knows that. I thought it was nearer Vladivostok than I find it is, but I am not ashamed in the least to say that I am still able to learn.

Mr. REED. I have not the slightest doubt that the Senator can still learn. I know he can learn if he tries, although his present expanse of learning is very broad, as broad as that of any man with whom I am acquainted. Nevertheless, in dealing with the question involving the rights of the United States, the startling thing is that the learning and industry of the Senator does not lead him to investigate the location and importance of this island over which Japan and Russia have been contending for some years, one half of which is occupied by the Russians or claimed by them, the other half claimed by Japan.

Mr. LODGE. The other half is owned by Japan under the treaty of Portsmouth.

Mr. REED. They having wrested it from Russia.

Mr. LODGE. They have the same title to the southern half of Sakhalin that we have to California.

Mr. REED. It has a relation, as I undertake to say I can prove without any difficulty, of the greatest importance in any military or naval adventure in Siberia. When I said, with perhaps a temerity that is reprehensible, that it would be drenched in blood, I had in mind the fact that Japan and Russia are as certain as anything in the future is certain to come to grips in Russia, and when that occurs Russia will find herself menaced by Japan employing the island of Sakhalin as a base of operations, which is simply the statement of a fact so obvious that any man is warranted in assuming it will occur. At least a man who has tried to study the question a little bit is quite as warranted in making an assumption as a Senator who states that he was for weeks on a commission drawing a treaty and that he never studied the question at all.

Mr. LODGE. No; I said I did not consider the strategic value, which is an entirely different thing. I am perfectly willing to admit that my memory had deceived me as to the southernmost point of Sakhalin. I found it much farther from Vladivostok, which is the strategic point the Senator was talking about yesterday, than I had supposed.

The Senator is criticizing me for not paying more attention to it. Yesterday I think the Senator had some doubt as to whether the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance was stated in the treaty.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; in the running debate here I glanced at the treaty and my eye did not catch the particular clause, which I knew was in some one of these documents. I made a mistake and said it was not in the treaty, and it was there. I am glad to know that the Senator knew it was there. That is at least refreshing.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I knew that much. My knowledge is not much, but I knew what was in that treaty.

Mr. REED. But evidently the Senator is not very well informed as to what he meant because he and his associates agreed to a treaty, then had to change it twice themselves before he reported it, and now brings forward another reservation changing it again.

Mr. LODGE. I may say I also made a mistake. The mistake I made was about the distance of Vladivostok from Sakhalin. The one the Senator made was in speaking of the island of Sakhalin as threatening Vladivostok.

Mr. REED. I still say so.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Senator ought to study the map, too.

Mr. REED. The Senator seems to be of the opinion that a few miles difference puts a point of land out of military consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I think that would suggest itself to the Senator's mind.

Mr. REED. I do not think he will find a military or naval expert in the world who will not say that this island is of the greatest importance in any attack that might be made upon the Russian coast or in any contest there arising.

Mr. LODGE. On the Siberian coast; yes; that is a different proposition.

Mr. REED. That is just what I was talking about, and I have not talked about anything else.

Mr. LODGE. Yesterday the Senator referred to its strategic value to Vladivostok, as he will find if he will examine the RECORD.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts now is speaking, I suppose, about the particular point on the coast to which I referred.

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking about the point we had under discussion on yesterday when the Senator from Missouri referred to Sakhalin as threatening Vladivostok, and I answered that I did not remember how far away the island was.

Mr. REED. Really, is the discussion of that worth while?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think any of the debate we are having is worth while.

Mr. REED. I think not, and I think the most worthless part of it that I have yet heard, with the exception of the poetry about the lilies "that o'erlace the sea," was the dissertation of yesterday, which told us nothing, which was carefully and painfully prepared and as painfully listened to.

Mr. President, there is no reason for anyone to be petulant about this matter. The point I was discussing on yesterday was the importance of this island in any contest arising between Russia and Japan. Whether it was important to the particular port of Vladivostok or was important to some point a little farther north or south is utterly immaterial to the discussion. But that it is important to that particular port, I assert there will not be a respectable naval or military authority in the world found to enter a denial.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Really, Mr. President, it does not seem to me as I view this treaty and the relationship which it creates between the four contracting powers that it makes any difference in what part of the Pacific, or even in what part of the world, and controversy arises between these nations and any outside nation. The history of all wars, and particularly the Great War of 1914, shows that war would instantly call into action these four powers, because every part of their possessions would be involved whenever any part of them was involved. Whether it is an island that is attacked or the mainland that is attacked, nevertheless the attack will inevitably spread; so that this particular provision of the treaty will call into conference these nations for the purpose of taking care of their interests and their rights. A shot was fired in a small country in Europe in the midsummer of 1914. At that time there were two political groups in Europe, one known as the Triple Alliance and the other known as the Triple Entente. Instead of these alliances or political groups assisting the cause of peace, or instead of helping to localize the conflict, they were the instruments by which the conflict was made world-wide. Yet both these alliances were, according to their terms, made to preserve the peace of Europe.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is unquestionably true. To talk about confining the operations of the treaty to the waters of a particular ocean is of as much avail as writing an agreement that the waters of one ocean shall not flow into another when there is nothing between them whatsoever.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, nothing better illustrates that than does the Anglo-Japanese alliance. There is no provision of the Japanese alliance, technically construed, under which Japan could have entered the Great War of 1914; technically construed, there was no occasion for her to act; but the interests of her ally, Great Britain, were involved; Great Britain called upon her—as a general principle, it would appear, because the technical terms of the alliance would not permit it—to cooperate with her in that part of the world, and she did so. This alliance recites that it was designed to maintain peace in the regions of the Far East. At the time Japan entered the war Germany was disturbing no one in the Far East. The peace in the Far East was first broken by the signatories of the alliance.

Mr. REED. That is true of all these agreements. Nations are held together by interests; they are not held together by paper treaties.

Now, either to show that I was right on yesterday or that the Senator from Massachusetts had not studied the question, my attention has been called to this reply, being the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, on page 3549 of the RECORD:

It—

Referring to the island of Sakhalin—

might be of value, of course. Japan owns half of it, and holds the other half on account of an uprising and a massacre which occurred there. It would be of military value to anyone attacking Vladivostok, no doubt; but, as far as being a base of support is concerned, they are practically as near their own islands as they are to Sakhalin.

I imagine that if Russia were to become involved in war with Japan, if Russia had an ally, which she will have some day, and if that ally could take this island and use it as a base for an attack upon the Japanese fleet, it would be found to be of very great importance.

I repeat that if there is anything certain in the future, anything that may be safely prognosticated, not as something that we know will come but something that probably will come, it is this: Russia will insist on driving the Japanese from the mainland. When that occurs the conflict will be carried to this island and to other islands of the Pacific. Then if the construction of this treaty be that which the Japanese have placed upon it and which the British minister has placed upon it, as was shown by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] this afternoon, we shall be bound to enter the contest on the side of Japan and against Russia.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has prophesied that in the near future, in his opinion, there will be a contest between Japan and Russia. The Senator need not assume the rôle of the prophet, which is said to be a dangerous rôle. He may state it as a fact right now. If the news could be brought into this country of what has actually transpired it would disclose that there is a contest now going on in Siberia that is no different from a condition of war. The two peoples are now actually engaged in a struggle over territory in that country. In this connection I should like to read a statement made by the former foreign minister of Russia under Kerensky a few days ago, which was printed here in America. Speaking of the present transgressions in Russia by the Japanese, he says:

The methods used by the Japanese are not those of temporary occupation but of a lasting annexation, accompanied by a gradual dispossession and final elimination of the Russian population in the occupied territories. The Japanese are not only depriving the Russians of all means of subsistence; they are not only abolishing Russian laws, Russian courts, and Russian administration, they are formally treating Russians as "foreigners" in their own country; they are giving Japanese names to the streets in Russian towns; they permit no other official language but the Japanese. They are building railways and harbors; they are exploiting mines and fisheries; in short, they are behaving as actual masters. I need not mention how great is the strategic significance of their occupation, which corks up the Russians in Siberia, transforms the Japan Sea into an internal sea, and eliminates Russia from the Pacific. This fact seems to be well understood by the State Department.

Shall I mention the kind of feeling toward Japan which is thus being generated and perpetuated among the Russian masses? Bolshevism in Siberia is supported to a large extent by the fear and hatred inspired by the Japanese activities. The bolsheviki for a long time have been looked at by the population as liberators and real patriots. This is what made possible even events like that at Nicolayevsk.

I am sorry that there was no chance for discussing the Siberian question at the Washington conference. A well-prepared debate might have made clear all my points and much more. But we have the conclusion. The Japanese policy in Siberia is openly branded as untenable and irreconcilable with the democratic principles of a really sound policy toward Russia. Such has been and remains the policy of the United States.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the conflict is now going on; the strife is now at hand, and, while treaties may do something, I presume, toward insuring peace, if the Japanese had been willing to get out of Siberia, if they had been willing to get out of Manchuria, if they had been willing to surrender the 21 demands, or if they had been willing to reconcile the situation now existing in that country to a state of peace, it would have been worth more than all the treaties that could possibly be written. But they were not willing to get out; they were not willing to compromise; they were not willing that the question even should be discussed; and now, while we are considering a treaty which is supposed to advance the cause of peace, a contention is going on between the two great powers which is nothing more nor less than a state of war.

I desire to submit one further observation before I sit down. I read from a Washington paper of this morning a dispatch published from Honanfu, as follows:

Holding himself the champion of the Chinese people and condemning and supporting the Peking Government in the same breath, Gen Wu Pei Fu is preparing to hold the rich Provinces of Central China against all comers until a stable government has been created.

In the seven Provinces under his control, Gen. Wu has 700,000 troops, four modern arsenals, large clothing warehouses, and factories for manufacturing munitions and equipment for a larger force.

Gen. Wu is rapidly becoming a power for good or evil in China. He is seizing revenues right and left which would normally go to Peking.

"I hope that we will not have to fight," he said, as he strolled among the drilling troops, "but we must have China for the Chinese people."

Mr. President, according to statistics which have been furnished me from a reliable source 77½ per cent of the territory of China is now under the control and domination of foreign powers. The nine-power treaty and the four-power treaty, when ratified, will fix the status quo and in effect confirm in the possession of foreigners 77½ per cent of the entire territory of China. The result of that seems to be that the Chinamen who propose to rid China of foreign domination, which they hoped would result from the Washington conference, have raised the cry of "China for the Chinese," and that cry is sweeping China as no other call has in half a century. While we are here talking about a four-power treaty producing world peace and a nine-power treaty establishing the rights of China, China has fallen back on herself and armed. What for? To get rid of that which the nine-power treaty will in effect fasten upon them, and to resent the domination which the nine-power treaty places upon China.

So I repeat, Mr. President, if the Japanese had been willing to surrender their claims in Manchuria, claims which have no legal basis of right, if they had been willing to surrender in Siberia that which they call their "rights," founded upon force, or if when the question arose Great Britain had been willing to give up her possessions in China, which she objected to doing, we might have had an assurance of peace in the Far East; but it is perfectly useless to talk about peace when war is already on for the very reason assigned for the negotiation of these treaties. China knows the effect of these treaties is to recognize past aggressions. Russians know the effect of these treaties is to recognize the aggressions in Siberia. Those things make for war, not peace. Treaties must either rest upon justice or force. There is no justice in treaties which recognize these unconscionable aggressions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator for his very forceful and illuminating contribution. Not only is it true that Japan is seeking to hold the mainland of Siberia, but it is also true, according to the best advices I have been able to get, that the Russians are actively preparing to eject her. I saw accounts the other day to the effect that the Russian troops are being gradually moved toward the points occupied by the Japanese, and that it is anticipated that when the spring opens hostilities will open about the same time.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has put his finger upon the real cause of war. I myself mentioned it a few days ago. It is found in the violation of the commandment "Thou shalt not steal." If the nations of the earth would come to an understanding, and keep the understanding, that they would each and all stop stealing the lands of other peoples, practically every great cause of war would be removed. The trouble with the Versailles treaty, however, was that it confirmed, or undertook to confirm, the titles to lands occupied by peoples who had been subjugated wrongfully and to transfer them at will from one government to another. A dominion greater than that of ancient Rome was transferred by a single stroke of the pen to the British Empire alone.

Japan for years has been invading the Asiatic mainland. She took Korea by treachery and force. She held it by cruelty and by the sword. She invaded Manchuria and wrested a large part of that country from China. Russia was engaged in the same buccaneering expedition, and the two thieves clashed over the right to despoil China, and that brought on the Japanese-Russian War. This treaty, I unhesitatingly say, the product of British diplomacy and Japanese cunning, has made the United States a pawn to be employed by Japan to sustain and protect Japan as against Russia when Russia undertakes to eject Japan from her mainland and from her island possessions. I do not wonder that they succeeded, when our delegates say they never considered the question of the strategic importance of the islands of the Pacific, and when they had not even located the island of Sakhalin.

It is not hard to understand how British and Japanese diplomats, who have studied every island, every harbor, every trade route, should have succeeded with gentlemen who say they were only considering peace and not thinking about war at all. Yet the certain cause of war is the inability of a people to defend themselves. Let it be known that the United States was absolutely defenseless and they would divide our raiment among them, and upon our vestments they would cast lots just as readily as in the olden times that office was performed for the garments of the Christ.

Mr. President, the best part of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday was the portion he read from a magazine article written by Mr. Simonds. He was reading Mr. Simonds's deductions in part. Mr. Simonds's facts are always much better than his deductions. Let me read you some of the facts that Mr. Simonds recites in this same article:

It will be seen that the United States has made by all odds the largest sacrifice in the matter of nonfortification, as she did in the matter of the scrapping of new and old tonnage. Surprise has been and doubtless will be expressed over the fact that the Aleutian Islands have been included in the area covered by the nonfortifying agreement. This was unexpected and represents a concession out of all proportion to any made by any other signatory power. It represents a sacrifice of sovereignty which could only be defended by complete satisfaction in the terms of the four-power treaty.

The Senator from Massachusetts did not read that.

I continue reading from Mr. Simonds:

Yet it remains true that the United States never has fortified the Aleutian Islands.

Further the author says:

We have retired our naval frontier behind the Hawaiian Islands, but before doing this we have entered into solemn engagements with all the Pacific powers—

Now, this is the opinion of Mr. Simonds—which constitute a guarantee for our islands at least as strong as any which could be found in the few fortifications Congress would be likely to permit in the near future. Actually our insular dominions west of Hawaii are indefensible.

Discussing the question which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] so clearly stated, Mr. Simonds declares:

It remains, therefore, now to deal briefly with the question of Siberia and that of China.

As to Siberia, it would be idle to pretend that any settlement has been reached at Washington. In advance of a discussion of this subject there came from Tokyo a definite statement, made by Baron Uchida, that Japan would not discuss in Washington the date or conditions for the evacuation of Siberia. This declaration of policy was carried out to the letter in the subsequent days. It follows, therefore, that Siberia remains for the future.

The limit of attainment and of possible attainment was touched when Baron Kato and Mr. Shidehara renewed in the most solemn manner the pledges that Japan would retire from Siberia at the moment when such retirement would not risk the lives or property of Japanese nationals. Beside this declaration in the Washington conference was placed the statement of the American Secretary of State indicating what American policy had been and still was with respect to Siberia. Patently this was the sum total that could be achieved, since Japan was not prepared to retire and the United States was bound, in the nature of things, to accept the formal and categorical assurance of Japan. It is clear that if Japan does not retire, sooner or later we shall see war in the Far East, and that war will follow logically the reintegration of Russia.

Begging pardon for my prophecy, perhaps it was inspired in part by having read Mr. Simonds's article. Mr. Simonds seems to be the chief and only authority quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech. He ventures to say what common sense will indicate to any person, that certain conditions will bring certain results, and that these particular conditions spell war—inevitable and certain war.

I continue reading:

Japan remains in Siberia under pledge to quit. As long as she stays no one can regard the far eastern question as settled or believe that in this respect the Washington conference has done more than state without modifying an unsatisfactory condition.

Mr. Simonds further declared:

The same remains true in the matter of Manchuria. Japan has avoided a discussion of her occupation of the Manchurian territory acquired from Russia. She has agreed to certain modifications with respect of certain portions of Manchuria, such as permitting the investment of foreign capital and the waiving of exclusive commercial privileges. But she has not in any degree consented to weaken her hold upon the great Manchurian Province. Here, then, too, the Washington conference has necessarily failed to produce satisfactory results. It has failed because Japan was neither willing nor ready to evacuate.

Precisely the same position was taken by Mr. Balfour for Great Britain in the matter of Kowloon, which is the mainland shore facing Hongkong. The declaration of Mr. Balfour, on December 3, that Great Britain felt it necessary to retain this territory foreshadowed a similar statement by Japan in regard to Manchuria, and destroyed all hope of complete evacuation of the mainland of China by foreign nations.

Mr. President, why should not those observations go in along with the portion introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts? A little later the same distinguished writer states:

We had still another striking and peculiar situation. The battleship had long been the standard of sea strength. But our own Admirals Sims and Fiske; the British naval authority, Sir Percy Scott, who had guessed right about the submarine before the World War; and Admiral De Bon, of the French Navy, all agreed that the day of the battleship was over. The best experts in all navies were of the opinion that money put into battleships was wasted, even from the point of view of war strength, as a consequence of the development of aircraft and possible expansion of submarine warfare.

Now the fusion of all these reasons explained the success of the Hughes program in naval limitation. But they were all unusual reasons. I mean by that, reasons which existed with respect of a single engine of warfare. The proof lies in the fact that when the conference passed from battleship to submarine, agreement disappeared. Britain wanted to abolish, America to limit. France was willing to limit, but asked the maximum allotment granted any nation, while Italy, wanting submarines but not claiming the maximum, felt called upon to demand equality with France. As a result we had deadlock and failure both as to submarines and as to those auxiliary cruisers which are the defensive answer to submarines.

The same was true in another field, namely, land armaments. Here France as the supreme land power confronted the conference with the declaration that her people saw the question in one way, and had based their land strength upon this view. As a consequence, land armaments were dropped from the discussion of limitation of armaments.

Now, it follows, quite logically, both from the successes and the failures of the Washington conference, that it is not correct to conclude that there is a new spirit abroad in the world or a new era at hand.

I read a little more from the opinions of Mr. Simonds, as expressed in an article of January 30, 1922:

So far as the United States is concerned, we resign the right to fortify everything west of Hawaii. This includes the Aleutian Islands on the north, the Philippines and Guam on the west, and Samoa on the south. Thus the United States retires its naval frontier to the longitude of Hawaii. In resigning the right to fortify Guam we do two things: Abandon all possibility of defending the Philippines by the intervention of our fleet, and also the ability to attack Japan navally.

In an article dated February 4, the same author states:

For the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which was no longer of value, Japan has obtained a four-power treaty which adds greatly to her prestige as a world power, insures her against attack or challenge from the United States, and leaves her with hands free to deal with both China and Siberia as she may hereafter choose. Save as the United States might ally itself with Britain and make use of British naval bases, there would be in the future no way of American intervention in the Far East.

In other words, according to Mr. Simonds, we give up the Pacific Ocean very largely, and we give up specifically any chance for any real influence in the Far East, which must constitute one of our great markets. I continue reading:

British success was late in two things, in exchanging the Anglo-Japanese alliance for the four-power treaty, which to all British minds is a symbol of close association in the future between the two great English-speaking nations in the world. And in addition Britain has avoided a naval competition with the United States which promised either bankruptcy or ultimate resignation of equality upon the blue water which Britain has ruled so long.

As for the United States, in return for sacrifices which are by all odds the most considerable, we have abolished a danger of ultimate collision with Japan in the Pacific.

That is his opinion. I do not agree with him. The stronger you make Japan, the more dangerous Japan becomes.

The Senator from Massachusetts this morning remarked to the Senator from Arkansas that he could probably get some information by reading the memoirs of Count Hayashi, the Japanese statesman who negotiated the Anglo-Japanese pact. I have that work, and I want to read the Japanese statesman's opinion of that alliance. Of course, it was written in 1898, before the new treaty was negotiated:

The Anglo-Japanese alliance is the established policy of Japan. It is the basis of the country's foreign policy. It was concluded owing to the common interests of the two countries demanding it, a demand reported by the traditional relations of the two countries. The alliance may, therefore, be regarded as resting on the most solid foundation. Every effort and every mischievous trick having for its object the splitting of the tie cementing the two countries must end in failure.

In view of Count Hayashi's statement, that the Anglo-Japanese treaty is a part of the traditional policy of Japan and of Great Britain; that it springs out of the mutual interests of the two countries, and that it rests upon the most solid foundation, how absurd it is to say that they bartered it for a treaty which promises nothing whatever except the opportunity to sit down around a table and discuss your grievances or your dangers, without any obligation to do anything as the result of the discussion. The mere statement of the matter proves its absurdity, and the quotation from the author to which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was referred by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] fortifies and demonstrates the argument made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas made a very powerful speech, in which he dwelt upon the construction of the language of the treaty; but I want to call the Senator's attention and the country's attention to the fact that there is other language in this treaty which makes it perfectly clear, to my mind, that the Senator from Massachusetts is in error when he states that we have not agreed to do anything except talk; that this treaty is a pink tea, at which everybody is privileged to say whatever he pleases and nobody is responsible for anything he says.

If we turn to the preamble of the treaty, where its purpose is recited, we get much light with reference to the subsequent language.

With a view to the preservation of the general peace—

Not the peace of the Pacific, but the general peace—and the maintenance of their rights in relation to the insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean * * * the high contracting parties * * * have determined to conclude a treaty.

Now, notice the language:

With a view—

And I scan the sentence now—

With a view to the preservation * * * and the maintenance * * * of their rights * * * to their insular possessions, * * * the high contracting parties * * *

Have determined to conclude this treaty.

If said rights are threatened * * * the high contracting parties shall communicate * * * in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies.

That is, to repel the attack. The preamble recites that the object of the treaty is to defend the Pacific island possessions of the respective parties, and article 2 recites that when those possessions are menaced the parties shall meet and consult as to the most efficient means to repel the attack, either singly or jointly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. That provision not only contemplates that the conference shall determine what shall be done but how it shall be done, whether by one of the parties to it or all of them together.

Mr. REED. Unquestionably.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The broad language certainly has impressed itself upon the Senator also, "to determine what shall be done." That does not confine the activities of the nations to the Pacific Ocean or to any contest or battle over these various insular possessions. It is a well-known part of the history of nearly every war that when a country gets into war you not only attack it in one hemisphere but in another, wherever it is weakest. Attacking it upon the opposite side from that where the war exists will compel it to withdraw its forces from the seat of war to protect its territory at the rear or anywhere else.

That has been illustrated by our own War with Spain. We went to war over Cuba, but the first battle was fought on the other side of the world. We struck Spain where she was weakest and unprotected.

It was so in the World War. Germany, France, and England were engaged in a war upon the fields of France and Belgium, and yet England, through her allies, struck Germany in China and had Japan to seize all of these islands that are not held by her by mandate.

The fact is that instead of this being a treaty concerning islands in the Pacific Ocean, it is only a mere electric button which, touched there, sends the deadly current of war wherever the four powers have any possessions. It would be the most common thing in the world if a war arose there between Japan and some European nation for us to attack that European nation, and the performance of this agreement to do whatever the exigencies required, and thus weaken it. You can not confine war to any part of the world as was demonstrated by the World War. Start the fire at one place and, where the nations have territories all over the world, it extends to the whole world.

Mr. REED. I think we had some illustration in the Revolutionary War of a French fleet coming over and striking England at Yorktown. We had some illustrations in our own case in the World War. Some vessels were sunk in the Atlantic. Under normal or ordinary conditions we probably would have had a war upon the sea with Germany. It might have begun there and ended there, but it was manifest to every man who understood the situation that the place to strike Germany effectively was in France; therefore we sent our soldiers to fight on the soil of France, although many who sat here and voted for the war thought we would never have to send a soldier outside of our own borders.

A little common sense applied to this thing and to the situation which will arise if there is ever any use for this treaty will illustrate the impossible position in which the philosophy of the Senator from Massachusetts would place us. Let us assume that Japan engages in a war with some other country, or that Great Britain engages in a war with some other country, and that some of the British islands held in the Pacific Ocean are threatened or are actually attacked, and thereupon Great Britain calls for a council of the four powers, and they meet.

Great Britain says, "We have been attacked. We signed a treaty with you in which we recited that it was made with a view to the preservation and maintenance of our rights in relation to these island possessions, and our right is to hold these islands. You agreed that if our rights were threatened by any power you would sit down with us in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, either jointly or separately, and to repel such an invasion. Now let us talk about the most efficient measures to be taken."

So we sit there and agree that as a war fleet is bearing down upon these islands, manifestly the most efficient thing to do is to get there with a bigger fleet and sink the enemy, and we come to that understanding. Then the question comes up for consideration, Shall it be done jointly or separately? It is agreed the joint action is more effective than single action. Then it is proposed that the United States shall furnish a part of the fleet, and the representative of the United States replies, "Oh, very true, we signed this treaty and we said we were going into it with the other powers in order to maintain the rights of all of the powers to their island possessions. These are the island possessions of Great Britain. It is very true we said if they were threatened by the aggressive action of any other power we would communicate with each other. They have been threatened. It is very true that we said we would communicate in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken jointly or severally to meet the attack or the exigency. We agreed to all that. We now agree with you that the most efficient means is the joint action of our respective fleets, but we decline to do anything."

Can anyone imagine a representative of the United States Government taking that position? Can anyone imagine any self-respecting nation signing a treaty that left us and all the other signatories in a situation so they could refuse to do anything and that that would be accepted as a treaty guaranteeing peace when it guarantees nothing whatsoever? Why do we meet and talk in order to determine a question unless, when it has been determined, it is to be followed by action?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose the representative of the United States, under the circumstances detailed by the Senator, gave as the reason for his declining to do anything his statement that we never had bound ourselves to do anything?

Mr. REED. Suppose he did. He would stand before the world as a breaker of faith. The treaty's terms imply action, just exactly as similar terms and almost identical words in the League of Nations covenant implied action. At the proper time I shall put into the RECORD the discussion of those words by Senators on this floor and shall show that the arguments which they then made they are retracting now. I think I shall be able to include in that language some very pertinent remarks then made by the Senator from Connecticut—at least, I think the remarks are pertinent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so, too; and I will say to the Senator that I think Japan or any of the other high contracting parties under the treaty, taking its preamble in connection with the body of the treaty, could very consistently claim that the treaty did, as it stands, create and imply an obligation to come to the aid of the other high contracting parties if their rights in relation to their insular possessions or dominions were threatened by the aggressive action of an outside power.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for that statement. It is a frank statement, and it is consistent with what he argued when construing similar language in the Versailles treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that a construction placed upon a treaty by the parties who made the treaty at the time of making the treaty and who assent to it on behalf of their respective Governments should have any weight?

Mr. REED. The construction placed upon a treaty by those who draw it may be persuasive, just as comments made by Members of the Senate at the time of the enactment of a law may be somewhat persuasive; but the Senator from Wisconsin is well aware of the rule of law that a contemporaneous construction is never controlling and is never employed to overturn the plain intendment of the language of a law itself.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true where the language is not ambiguous; but where the language is susceptible of two constructions the Senator is very familiar with the rule that even debates in the Senate may be resorted to?

Mr. REED. Yes; but they are resorted to as the weakest kind of evidence and as an argument with the least force. The reason therefor is that in construing a statute the fact that certain men may have expressed an opinion does not prove that others may not have voted for the law because they were of a directly opposite opinion. So in this case the contemporaneous construction by one man does not bind the others. Moreover, it can not bind those legislative bodies which must become parties to the instrument, because those legislative bodies were not present, and they must judge the instrument by what appears within its four corners, instead of by the opinions expressed in speeches by individuals who may have had something to do with drawing the treaty. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], however, put into the RECORD this afternoon the construction of this document by both the British and the Japanese, and the construction was diametrically opposite to that presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Missouri take the position that the United States in entering into a treaty is bound by the construction given to that treaty by other parties to the treaty?

Mr. REED. I do not.

Mr. LENROOT. I should hope not.

Mr. REED. But the Senator just a moment ago was urging that the construction placed upon the treaty by those who had to do with its making was controlling, and I answered that by saying that it was not controlling, and giving the reason why it was not.

I further stated that the representatives of Great Britain and of Japan had, according to the statements put into the RECORD by the Senator from Arkansas, given a construction different from that given by the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, the Senator from Wisconsin is turning in his own tracks. A moment ago he was urging that contemporaneous construction was controlling, and now he turns upon me and asks me if I would assert that the contemporaneous construction by Japan or Great Britain was controlling. Certainly it would be as controlling as would be our construction; those Governments have as much right to construe the treaty as have we. The construction by none of these powers is controlling. Nothing will be controlling unless it be written in the form of an amendment, which is accepted by all the powers, or a reservation, which is acceded to by all of the powers.

Mr. LENROOT. When the representative of the United States, in presenting the treaty to the conference, undertakes to give the construction of the American delegates to that treaty, and that construction is impliedly accepted by the heads of all the other delegations, and in some cases expressly accepted, does the Senator think that the United States would ever be in a position of bad faith in following that construction?

Mr. REED. The United States would be absolutely in bad faith in the eyes of the world unless the construction were the true construction. It comes back to the same question.

Mr. SHIELDS rose.

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment.

Contemporaneous construction is never accepted as controlling. It may be persuasive, and that is all. The reason that is so is that if there are ten parties to an agreement and one of them gets up and places a construction upon it which suits himself the other nine have the right to sit silent and say nothing except that "we stand upon the instrument"; for an instrument is written for the very purpose of putting the agreement into an instrument and not in outside desultory talk.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I know that neither one of the Senators employs the expression "contemporaneous construction" in its strictly technical sense, which imports a construction immediately entered into by the parties after an agreement is executed and goes into force. Declarations made at the time as to what it means, which practically are in addition to it or amendments, are excluded, of course, upon the well-settled rule of evidence that oral statements and oral agreements can not be considered in construing and enforcing a written instrument, as the complete agreement of the parties is presumed to be in writing. Such discussions as are going on now may only be resorted to sometimes to relieve or explain an ambiguity.

As the Senator from Missouri stated, the Supreme Court and all the courts of the States have held that they are really the very weakest proof of the intention of the parties that may be adduced. Something to that effect was said the other day in an opinion by Chief Justice Taft, but the "contemporaneous construction" which is sometimes admitted to be controlling is that which occurs in the carrying out of the terms of an executed contract. This treaty is yet in the making; it has not been ratified by any country in the world; and, of course, no one is yet acting under it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment.

The distinction made by the Senator is absolutely correct. The words "contemporaneous construction" in this instance, I take it, have been used in a loose sense. The construction which they may be putting upon this treaty now can be looked to only as throwing some possible light upon the question not as a determining factor. I repeat the reason is that, while I might make a speech upon this question and give it one construction, the Senator from Wisconsin might believe the language meant something entirely different. He might have determined to vote against it if my construction was correct, but, believing that the language meant something else entirely, he votes for the proposition. Of course, we can get nowhere by the kind of construction we are speaking of so far as determining the question is concerned.

Mr. SHIELDS. The court has given that very reason in explaining the weakness of such evidence, namely, that it is not a unanimous construction, but a construction of different members embodied in their speeches or utterances upon the subject.

Mr. REED. To apply it to these performances which we had in Washington—and that is what they were, stage performances, with somebody picked to appear upon a certain day in the spotlight and nobody else really privileged to say anything—and to hold that such constructions would bind any nation is ridiculous.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri what he thinks of treaty drafting when it is necessary for one of the delegates to stand up and say, "This is what I mean when I sign the treaty"?

If that is what he meant, why was not that written into the treaty itself, so that there would be no necessity of standing up and explaining the document as it was being presented?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think it is hard to understand this whole matter. This treaty was prepared by somebody—we do not know whom, but the fact——

Mr. CARAWAY. I think it might be asserted that the Senator from Missouri knows as much about it as anybody who signed it upon the part of the American Government.

Mr. REED. I think so; quite as much, and I know nothing about it. There is an inference we can draw from this language. It contains much of the phraseology of the Anglo-Japanese treaty, and it, therefore, is fair to presume that it was drawn in its essence or at least doctored in its essentials by Japanese or British statesmen. It was agreed to probably without any real study or consideration. That must have been the case, because the President himself in discussing the treaty said that it did not cover the mainland of Japan. So secret were these alleged open negotiations that the President himself did not know what was going on. Now we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts that there had been considerable discussion about it and that Japan had demurred; but there could not have been that character of consideration which a document of this importance called for or the President certainly would have known whether it embraced all of Japan or only a few outlying islands. It could not have been very maturely considered. Else why was it found necessary to amend it twice by subsequent treaties? Its meaning certainly could not have been very plain or very certain or the Senator from Massachusetts, who insists there is no doubt about it, would not come forward as the father of a reservation which gives to it a meaning entirely different from the plain import of the language of the document itself.

Either one of two things is true: Either they did not know what they were doing, or else, having acted with knowledge, when they brought this treaty to the Senate they found it necessary, when it began to be discussed by the public, to retreat from the ground they had expected to take and had taken. It was perfectly logical for the Senator from Massachusetts to think out reservations to the document known as the League of Nations, because he did not draw the document, but it would have been a little singular if the document had been brought over here to us by the President himself and, after having laid it down, saying that its meaning was perfectly plain, he then proceeded to draw reservations to his own instrument. We have here the case of one of the putative authors of this agreement proceeding to amend his own creation.

But, Mr. President, we must hasten through this treaty. It is true that one of our delegates has not even given us the benefit of his views. Another delegate did not give us the benefit of his views until yesterday. Therefore we are called upon to act, and to talk if we are not ready to act. Although there are Senators who are preparing addresses and studying the question, the order is haste.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, why it is that in the consideration of these treaties which have to do with the armament of the United States no naval or military expert was called before the committee to enlighten it as to whether or not these treaties were safe for us to sign? Why was not that done?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator expects me to answer the question, I will say that I know of nobody who requested that it be done.

Mr. REED. I do not suppose that anybody in the world would think it necessary to go to a committee charged with the duty of knowing what it was doing and suggesting to that committee, with such men on it as the Senator himself, that they ought to inquire and find out what was meant by this treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not mean any other Senator; I mean that no Senator on the committee thought it was necessary to summon military or naval experts before the committee, because, as we understood, those military experts had all given the benefit of their advice to the American delegation who made the treaty.

Mr. REED. We have no minutes of that kind. There seems to be preserved no record of that sort. Therefore it could not have been made before the members of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator asks me why they were not summoned, and I am telling him that so far as I know the reason was that the American delegation who negotiated the treaty had the benefit of the opinion of the naval experts.

Mr. REED. That is the first information of that sort we have had. That may have been the impression of the committee; but how could the committee, how could the Senator himself pass upon the question, employing his own judgment, until he had heard from these naval officers? Necessarily the Senator was assuming that the evidence had been produced and taking somebody else's judgment as to the meaning of that evidence. Does not the Senator think it would be a wise thing for us to ascertain whether or not it is true, as is now intimated, if not directly charged, that our disarmament program leaves us absolutely at the mercy of Great Britain, and that while we are at some time hereafter to have an equality of tonnage, we do not have an equality of gun power or an equality of speed, and that it is asserted by some naval authorities that a single vessel of the British Navy might put out of action half of the American Navy simply because she has 16-inch guns and can run 10 knots an hour faster than anything in the American Navy? Would not the Senator be interested in investigating that question and finding out what the facts are in that regard?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator asks me the direct question, and so I want to answer. I am not a naval expert nor a military expert, and I understand that the makers of this treaty consulted with the naval experts who were appointed by the Navy Department for that purpose, and I am taking their judgment also. If each Senator were to be his own military and naval expert, we probably would not come to a unanimous decision about what it was wisest to do. My understanding is that we are left in equally as advantageous a position, so far as effective naval armament and tonnage are concerned, as Great Britain is. I may be wrong about that, but that is my understanding. I have not attempted to summon or cross-examine naval experts. They were appointed to advise the American commissioners who were making the treaty, and they did so.

Mr. REED. May I inquire who they were?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would rather the Senator would make that inquiry of the commissioners who were in consultation with them. I know, in a general way, that the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Col. Roosevelt, had the management of that matter, but the names of the individual officers whom he empowered to advise with them I do not know.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the representatives of the Navy Department who met with the commissioners before the conference assembled—and they were with us a great deal when we were considering the reduction of armament—were, first, the Secretary of the Navy, who came only once or twice, as I remember; the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Admiral Coontz, the chief of operations; and Admiral Pratt.

Mr. REED. Pratt and Coontz were the two?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. One was the chief of naval operations and the other was his assistant.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator if their testimony was taken?

Mr. LODGE. We discussed the whole question of naval disarmament.

Mr. REED. Was any memorandum made of it?

Mr. LODGE. No; we did not have stenographers present while we were talking it over with the naval officers.

Mr. REED. Did these naval officers say that we would be on a fighting equality with Great Britain?

Mr. LODGE. Under the treaty as it stands?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. It is perfectly clear on the face of the treaty, as to tonnage.

Mr. REED. As to tonnage?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and as to limitation of tonnage, and as to limitation of calibers, and quality of capital ships.

Mr. REED. Did these naval experts tell the American commissioners that England had any ships that had any advantages over ours?

Mr. LODGE. They told us everything. There is one English ship, the Hood, of 41,000 tons. The other ships of England are all smaller than ours and less modern ships, older ships.

Mr. REED. The Hood has a speed 10 knots an hour greater than that of the fastest American ships; has she not?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so. I can not tell without referring to the document.

Mr. REED. Have we any documents on the subject that were filed with the committee?

Mr. LODGE. Our modern ships, of which we have six of 32,000 tons—more than any other power—with 16-inch guns, are, I think, faster than any of the other ships.

Mr. REED. Faster than the British ships?

Mr. LODGE. I think so; and I do not think the Hood is a particularly fast ship. I have all those figures, if the Senator wants them. They are very easily found.

Mr. REED. I am interested in having them; and if we could get that much of the records of these committees I should be very glad.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can get all those details. They are all stated in Mr. Hughes's statement to the conference, which was published, and the tables are all given, and they are all in print. The Senator can examine them all if he cares to take the trouble to do it.

Mr. REED. I have seen those statements. I was going to inquire if Admiral Benson or Admiral Fiske were called before the American delegation.

Mr. LODGE. No; we did not ask them to appear before us. They are both retired officers.

Mr. REED. Was the present head of the Navy there?

Mr. LODGE. Admiral Coontz is the Chief of Operations.

Mr. REED. I am speaking of the head of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. The head of the Navy is Secretary Denby.

Mr. REED. I was trying to think of the name of the naval officer holding the highest rank.

Mr. LODGE. The officer holding the highest rank in the Navy, is, of course, the Chief of Operations.

Mr. REED. I want to be as specific as I can about this matter, because I am interested in knowing whether Admiral Coontz and Admiral Pratt informed the committee that in fighting strength we would be the equal of Great Britain.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator will find, if he will examine the figures of the ships—the Senator from Alabama [Mr.

UNDERWOOD] is here and can correct me if I am wrong—that we have six post-Jutland ships of the most modern type, more than any other power.

Mr. REED. What is their speed?

Mr. LODGE. They are 30-knot boats, as I remember; but I should have to look at the figures to be exact.

Mr. REED. Six 30-knot boats? Well, I have some figures that I will put in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Those figures are all very accessible, and I will have them here if the Senator wants them.

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there recently appeared in the World's Work a very able article that throws a great deal of light upon the subject the Senator is discussing; and I will ask him, if he still has the floor, whether he will permit that article to be read?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. It will not consume a great deal of time. I prefer that it be read from the desk, as the reading clerk has a much clearer enunciation than I have. I think it is very instructive, and worthy of consideration by the Senate in connection with the subject under discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the article referred to.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the article, and read as follows:

[From the World's Work for December, 1921.]

WHY JAPAN WOULD BE MISTRESS OF THE SEAS—AMERICA'S GREAT NAVAL AUTHORITY, ADMIRAL MAHAN, WHOSE BOOKS HAVE GUIDED JAPAN'S NAVAL POLICY—WHAT THE POLICY MEANS TO THE UNITED STATES.

(By William Howard Gardiner.)

There is general recognition of the fundamental influence that Bismarck and the later Pan-Germans have had upon Japanese policy. But it does not seem to be as generally realized that while Japan has modeled her statecraft and army on the Prussian pattern, her maritime policy is largely the result of her study of the doctrines expounded by that great American teacher of sea power, the late Admiral Mahan. Yet, in his "Life of Admiral Mahan," Mr. C. C. Taylor gives us documentary evidence of the profound interest the Japanese were taking in these teachings as long ago as 1897; and many of us who have been watching the consequent evolution of Japanese power in the light of Mahan's precepts, have long since recognized that it is the maritime aspect of Japanese policy that is of direct concern to the United States, and that an understanding of the principal doctrines of Mahan is essential to an adequate appreciation of the trend underlying Japanese statecraft.

The record from which Mahan drew his deductions as to the influence of sea power upon history is the record of how weak and poor Elizabethan England, with but 5,000,000 inhabitants, expanded into the present world-wide English-speaking civilization in little more than three hundred years. From this he pointed out the sources of sea power and showed how Britain's rise to preeminence was due to her naval power. Because she won the naval command of the Northern Atlantic she was able to defend her colonies here; and because Holland and France were unable to wring its command from her, they lost their colonies here and Britain took them over. To the naval preponderance of Britain in 1783 may be accredited the fact that the French did not dispute the claim on Australia that Britain set up in that year. Nelson's decisive victory at Trafalgar enabled Britain to carry on against Napoleon a strangling blockade and determining campaign of which Mahan wrote:

"The world has never seen a more impressive demonstration of the influence of sea power upon history. Those far distant, storm-beaten ships, upon which the grand army never looked, stood between it and the dominion of the world."

Such were some of the more prominent instances in which preponderant naval power determined the fate of continents through its command of the sea.

But Mahan teaches a far deeper lesson; for he shows that the naval power, adequate to win and hold the command of the seas, as British naval power did, was slowly evolved from overseas commerce and navigation. In this connection he says:

"The tendency to trade, involving of necessity the production of something to trade with, is the national characteristic most important to the development of sea power. * * * They (the English and Dutch) were by nature business men, traders, producers, negotiators. Therefore, both in their native country and abroad, whether settled in the ports of civilized nations or of barbarous eastern rulers, or in colonies of their own foundation, they everywhere strove to draw out all the resources of the land, to develop and increase them. * * * At home they became great as manufacturers; abroad, where they controlled, the land grew richer continually, products multiplied, and the necessary exchange between home and the settlements called for more ships."

Mahan indicates that this native desire for trade was one of the principal causes that led to the making of such colonial "plantations" as that of Jamestown, Va., in 1607, in order that the products of the new lands might be developed and their trading capacity with the home country increased. The ever-expanding trade led to a rapid rise in commercial prosperity which benefited a large element in the communities at home and overseas. This element, as well as the shipowners and navigators, saw to it that the nation furnished adequate naval protection to the possessions, commerce, and navigation from which the nation derived its prosperity. And, furthermore, the great merchant fleet served as the natural training school for the large numbers of seamen requisite on naval vessels driven by sail.

In short, Mahan's basic thesis is that broad-spread national prosperity, derived from overseas trade, fostered with overseas possessions, is the foundation of naval power.

Of these profound principles of sea power and of national power, as demonstrated in the expansion of the English-speaking civilization, and as expounded by Mahan, the Japanese have made a characteristically careful study—and one that well might be emulated by Americans, who seem to know less of the teachings of their great maritime scholar than do any other people largely dependent on sea power.

But the Japanese seem also to have taken note of a saying of Napoleon's, to the effect that an army is dependent on concentration for action (whether defensive or offensive), and upon dispersion for sustenance. The same might be said with even deeper meaning of naval power and of national power. Witness the world-wide dispersion of the English-speaking race for economic sustenance, the concentration of its constructive economic power in its great financial, mercantile, and industrial institutions, and the concentration of its defensive power in its navies.

Almost all of the great determining naval battles of the English-speaking race, from the Armada to Trafalgar and Jutland, have been fought in European waters, which heretofore have been the critical zone of concentration.

Mr. SHIELDS. The same purpose may be answered by having the balance of the article printed without reading, and Senators can read it in the RECORD, so I ask that the rest of the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the balance of the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

But, as the accompanying map of the English-speaking world shows, from the earliest days of our expansion we threw out long-voyage tentacles to remotely dispersed outposts in America and Asia for colonization and trade—i. e., economic sustenance—rather than first building up a central zone of relatively concentrated short-voyage trade that would have been easy to defend. On the face of it, this was poor strategy and very dangerous, for had any of our rivals cut our long and exposed lines of communication in the early days it is probable that to-day there would be no English-speaking United States, Canada, Australasia, and South Africa. It should be said, however, that this seemingly faulty strategy, which, fortunately, was not fatal, was dictated by the fact that England's continental neighbors were stronger on land than she was, and consequently inviolable, forcing her to span the oceans in her first moves.

Japan has been far better circumstanced in that her continental neighbors were relatively weak. This has enabled her to apply the trade doctrines of Mahan, first in the short-voyage and well-protected zone of concentration her navy has been able to command in her home waters, while she depended on the army it could convoy to conquer the continental areas with which she sought to build up sustaining trade. This operation, carried out in the last 16 years, has been preeminently successful, for not only has Japan brought under her sway the 450,000 square miles and more of continental land and the sea area indicated on the accompanying map, but she has virtually monopolized its trade and the resulting navigation; and, furthermore, she has become the local maritime common carrier of the Far East, which function, in turn, gives her great discriminatory powers over the trade of others with ports not under her political control.

In consequence of this trade and navigation Japan has developed a powerful group in her body politic whose prosperity is dependent on overseas trade, which trade has brought to Japan money wherewith to build a great navy. The result is that Japan is now spending more than one-third of her national income on her navy, while Americans talk as though our spending less than one-tenth of our national income on our Navy were an "intolerable burden," the abatement of which would go far to solve all our economic ailments. And this in the face of the fact that although to-day the United States Navy is about twice as big as that of Japan, in six years the effective Japanese Navy will be almost as large as ours, if present building programs are carried out.

The foregoing outline indicates that Japan, with extraordinary rapidity, is carrying out the teachings of Mahan in a systematic instead of in a sporadic way, building and progressively expanding the zone from which she draws most of her economic sustenance and in which zone her navy is so strong that the United States can not command there.

JAPANESE COLONIES.

But while developing her now inviolable zone of concentration in the Far East, Japan has not neglected to put into practice the lessons of Mahan as to dispersed or extensive trade and navigation. Indeed, it is noteworthy that it is since she recognized his teachings that the Japanese colonies have sprung up in Hawaii, in California, in South America, and have been attempted in Australasia. And it is also noteworthy that Japan runs specially subsidized lines of steamers to North and South America and to Australia.

As is well known, the pretext under which these colonial "plantations" are being pushed by Japan is that her home population is so overcrowded that it must be allowed to expand into other people's lands. In point of fact, only about half a million Japanese have left the Japanese archipelago during the last 35 years. If they had all remained in Japan, her present population density would be nearly 377 instead of 373 per square mile. In view of the fact that Japanese emigration during the last 35 years has lowered her present population density only 4 per square mile, there does not seem ground on which to argue that emigration has yet helped materially to ease Japan's alleged overcrowded condition—at any rate, not in proportion to the animosity that Japanese immigration has aroused in North America and in Australasia. Furthermore, if emigration were to be in such volume as to be really helpful by lowering the population density of Japan to, say, 200 per square mile, it would mean that 26,000,000 Japanese emigrants would have to be taken care of in other lands. It seems doubtful if the United States, Canada, and Australasia would be favorably inclined to receiving their quotas of these emigrants. Nor is it probable that the Japanese Government would look favorably on giving up 46 per cent of Japan's man power, unless this expatriated man power could be more useful to Japan in our countries than in Japan.

"CROWDED JAPAN."

In this connection it should be recalled that Japan is less crowded than are Holland, Belgium, and England. Furthermore, all of these European countries normally raise a smaller percentage of their food supplies than the 80 per cent and more that the Japanese now raise for their home consumption. England, in fact, raises much less than 40 per cent of the food her people consume, and yet supports over 700 inhabitants per square mile, thus showing that Japan could support far more than her present 373 inhabitants per square mile, if the Japanese would turn from militant imperialism to peaceful industrialism. And this is further emphasized by the fact that but one-fortieth of the Japanese are industrialist workers, whereas one-fourth of the inhabitants of England are industrialists. In other words, given adequate raw materials, industrial facilities, and markets, ten times as many Japanese as now do so could support themselves by industry in Japan.

The conclusion seems unavoidable that the whole fabric of the alleged necessity of Japanese emigration because of overpopulation must be dismissed as untrue. The student who has considered colonization, not only as a social operation but also as a maritime and military operation, will recognize under these circumstances that Japan's attempts at colonization in America and Australasia are designed to be "plantations" similar to the colonial "plantation" of Jamestown that England made in Virginia in 1607. It was the superior weapons and fighting ability of the English colonists that drove the American Indian from his lands. It is the superior working ability of the Japanese colonists that is driving the Californian from his lands. In both instances of colonization the result is the same—preemption of the land and means of livelihood.

These dispersed Japanese plantations are for the immediate purpose of developing an extensive long-voyage trade and navigation as distinguished from the intensive short-voyage operation in the concentrated home zone.

Without dispersion of major and vital forces and without setting up long and exposed vital lines of communication, as England had to do in the seventeenth century, Japan has built her concentrated zone of sea power and is progressively expanding it. But she is also supplementing it by widely dispersed extensive operations, designed to bring increased wealth and more extensive sea power to Japan.

If war were to come soon in the Pacific, each or all of these extended outposts could be sacrificed without vital loss, for they are yet but outposts. But if they are allowed to grow to full power, and if the resultant naval protection of their lines of communication with Japan is allowed to grow to commensurate strength, then these outposts will no longer be mere outposts in our countries, but strong Japanese bridgeheads on our shores, and a naval war in the Pacific will be a virtual impossibility because it will have become a Japanese ocean.

In outline the situation that confronts us is somewhat as follows: If Japan fails to abandon her imperialism voluntarily, the United States will be called on either to abandon the open-door doctrine or to make it effective by pressure on Japan. In order to uphold our open-door doctrine to protect China and her markets, as we have solemnly declared we would, we must command the Pacific even unto the China coasts. But in point of fact, and in spite of the present statistical superiority of our Navy, not the United States but Japan commands the Pacific in those Far Eastern waters which we must command if we are to support effectively our open-door doctrine.

NAVAL COMMAND IN THE PACIFIC.

This statement may be doubted by those who measure the relative strength of navies by comparing tabulations of their vessels, tonnage, and gun power. The measure of comparative naval power is not to be found in the schedule of each navy at its base, but in the effective strength of each at the probable scene of contact. A glance at the accompanying map will show that in the Far Eastern waters, of which we would seek the command, the Japanese fleet would be close to its bases, whereas we have no naval bases worthy of the name west of Hawaii; and, in point of fact, nowhere on our Pacific coast have we bases commensurate to the demands our fleet would put upon them the instant war were to break out.

Remoteness from an adequate base subjects the effective fighting power of a fleet to a proportionate discount; and this because of fuel limitations, the risks and naval costs of maintaining a heavy supply train over a long line of communication, and the added dangers to which crippled ships are exposed if they have to limp thousands instead of only hundreds of miles back to their repair bases. On the other hand, the close proximity of adequate bases adds to the effective power of a fleet to a degree that can be realized perhaps only by those having intimate knowledge of the mechanical strains and transportation problems that arise in modern naval warfare.

Specifically stated, there is not in the United States Navy a capital ship, afloat or building, that could merely steam from Hawaii to Guam and return—and this without stopping at Guam long enough to carry out the necessary operations to retake it—if she had to travel much of the round trip at battle speed and zigzagging, as she would have to do if this sea area were infested by enemy submarines. Consequently we could not operate against Guam if we had no base nearer to it than Hawaii. The popular fancy that our great fleet could blockade Japan, if based on Hawaii or on our Pacific coast, therefore, is utterly mistaken.

As the entire strategy of the Pacific depends upon the certain possession of impregnable bases in the most advantageous relation to the theater of operations, if we are to command in Far Eastern waters in order to make Japan respect our open-door doctrine, we must have an adequate and impregnable base in the Far East; and its lines of communication with the United States must be adequately protected.

Here we are confronted with the fact, as astounding as it is deplorable, that although we have an ideal location for such a base at Guam or in the Philippines, and although we own a string of islands connecting these possessions with the United States, which would facilitate the defense of our line of communications, yet both the Philippines and Guam are practically undefended and without anything approaching adequate base facilities. And, furthermore, these Philippines, which we leave unprotected in the center of the scene of present world stress, would be extremely valuable to Japan, because they would command southern China, in both the naval and commercial sense; and their possession is essential to Japan if she is to carry out the plans she has developed for expansion to the southward.

Not only are we confronted by the fact that we can not conduct offensive naval operations for the command of Far Eastern waters because we are without an adequate naval base there, but all our valuable possessions in the Far East are so devoid of defenses that, as Mr. Bywater says in his "Sea power in the Pacific," "within a fortnight after the beginning of hostilities the United States would find herself bereft of her insular possessions in the western Pacific, and consequently without a base (location) for naval operations in those waters. With Guam and the Philippines in enemy hands the problem confronting the United States would become well-nigh insolvable."

In these circumstances the first essential step would seem to be to give to all our vital possessions in the western Pacific such defenses that they can not be taken on short notice, or without notice.

The fact must be plainly stated that an adequate fleet base in the western Pacific, costing less than two battleships, would make our fleet all powerful there, would enable us to enforce our open-door doctrine, to stop the imperialism of Japan and her disruption of China, and would prevent war in the Pacific by making it suicidal for Japan to go to war against us. The single fact that we have not got such a base makes our great fleet impotent in the Far East. Our Nation is deprived of any power to enforce its open-door doctrine for the protection of China, for the stopping of imperialistic conquest, and for the preservation of the peace of the world. And by leaving undefended our Far Eastern possessions, which are so valuable to Japan, we invite war. If war comes, it will be primarily because we have saved this base cost amounting to less than that of two battleships. If war comes, we will lose many times two battleships; we will spend many billion dollars, and we will lose many thousand lives, all because we have saved the cost of a base amounting to less than that of two battleships.

It should be realized that the officers of our Navy Department have exhausted their resources in efforts to bring the former administration and Congresses to an appreciation of these facts. The naval appropriations bill for the current year, as passed by the Senate, carried several considerable items for Pacific bases, aircraft, and airplane carriers which were thrown out or greatly reduced by the House of Representatives. This action reflected the point of view of a large contingent of "first-term" Members of both parties in the House whose inexperience and ignorance of the situation in the Pacific does not relieve them of their direct responsibility for our present defenseless condition there, which invites war.

In conclusion, attention should be invited to the probability, amounting almost to a certainty, that a war between the United States and Japan would produce immediately much greater dangers to Britain than to America. The day that war was declared the British war office would have to issue the orders that would mobilize, equip, and transport to India more than 2,000,000 troops. It should be added that such a large part of the present British Navy would be required for operations connected with the manning of India, that little support could be added to the British naval forces normally in the Pacific.

If the United States were to fail to preserve the Philippines and they were to pass to Japan, it would be but a matter of time before Hongkong, other British interests in China, and French Indo-China would pass to Japan, for the Philippines command the coast of southern China and of Annam. And with the Philippines in the possession of Japan her route to the Dutch East Indies, India, and Australasia would be open.

With the possessions of both Britain and America very seriously menaced in the event of a Japanese-American war, it would seem inconceivable that both should not work as one at the Washington conference to show Japan that her only safety is in abandoning her imperialism entirely. For if she persists in her present course she will bring on the war of the English-speaking peoples for the freedom of the Far East. And though in this at first Japan would gain her immediate objectives, Japan would not be at war against other orientals or against semioriental Russians, but against the race that commands most of the resources of the world and that never turns back. If Japan can be brought to read our open mind as clearly as we penetrate her oriental adaptations of Prussian policies, she will see that not by imperialism but by peaceful industry is the true way for her to fellowship among the really great nations.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to say when the reading was begun, and I will say it now, that the United States has six modern post-Jutland ships—the Maryland, California, Tennessee, Idaho, New Mexico, and Mississippi—of 32,000 tons and over. Under the provisions of the treaty allowing Japan to keep the Mutsu, we were allowed to scrap two of the old ships, the North Dakota and the Delaware, holding two ships in the West Virginia class. So that we have eight of the modern ships. France has no ship of over 23,500 tons. Italy has none over 22,700 tons. Great Britain has only one ship of over 28,000 tons. Most of her ships are of 25,000 tons and under, only one being larger, the Hood, which is of 41,200 tons. Japan has two modern battleships of the first class, the Mutsu and the Nagato, of 33,800 tons, about 1,200 tons larger than our eight ships.

By the final arrangement we are left, in the most modern ships, much stronger than any other power. I hope to get a statement of the speeds of the different ships. I have not been able to get that yet, but I will have it to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

To God, our Father in heaven, we offer our tribute of thanksgiving. We have neither worth or merit to match Thy wealth of mercy and truth. We turn to Thee in humility and ask again to give life and encouragement to our languishing virtues. Impart to us strength, joy, and willingness, and as we wait in quiet reverence may we feel Thy purpose for our Nation. Be Thou our refuge and defense when peril is nigh and always regard our country according to Thy loving kindness. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to make a motion to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9597, and to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky calls from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9597, and moves to concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the bill by title and the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9597) entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the language stricken out by the amendment.

The language was read by the Clerk.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Was the provision that has been stricken out from this bill in the original bill that was reported to the House by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. LANGLEY. It was, as I recall; that is, it was a committee amendment. I may add that all of the proponents of the measure advise me that they are entirely satisfied with the Senate amendment, which really does not affect the main purpose of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to call to your attention and to the attention of the House that here is a bill reported by the committee which the House amended. It goes to the Senate, and the amendment is stricken out there. The people in favor of the amendment were on the conference, and the House ought to be informed on those things.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The fact is that this amendment was put on by the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and concurred in by the House. I will say further to the gentleman that the matter came up before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds this morning at a very well attended session. I think nearly all the members were present, and the committee this morning agreed unanimously to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Did you have additional information this morning that you did not have when you put the amendment in?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say that I took a part in framing this amendment, and at the time we thought it was a matter of proper precaution. We do not think it is of sufficient importance to stop the passage of the bill now.

Mr. MANN. The amendment was a matter of doubtful propriety, but the House let it go.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment to the bill H. R. 9597.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 1.

So the Senate amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. GLASS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication addressed to the Speaker:

MARCH 8, 1922.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committees on Reform in the Civil Service; Coinage, Weights, and Measures; and Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, to take effect immediately.

Very respectfully, yours,

A. PIATT ANDREW.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10730, with Mr. Hicks in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10730, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10730) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Thursday the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] had 56 minutes remaining of general debate, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] had 68 minutes remaining.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, last week the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and urged, in effect, that the committee report no bills authorizing appropriations for new plans or policies not already well established. For this statement he was criticized by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] has undertaken to defend the gentleman from Wyoming and to justify the Republican floor leader's statement before the Agricultural Committee. The gentleman from Kansas is a very able member of the committee and one of the leaders of this House. He is a skilled lawyer and both by training and experience an ardent advocate. He is gifted in the art of so marshaling his facts as to make them appear in the most favorable light for his side of any question. I say this not by way of criticism but by way of description.

It may be assumed, therefore, that the gentleman made the best defense of the course pursued by the gentleman from Wyoming that could possibly have been made. It was artful in the manner in which it was stated and in that which it left unstated, but in spite of all this, in my judgment, it falls far short of justifying the position taken.

Now, what are the facts? The gentleman from Wyoming appeared before the Agricultural Committee and spoke for about 1 hour and 30 minutes. It is true that much of his language was indefinite; much of his logic was past finding out, and much of his thought was concealed in a wilderness of phrases. However, as I understand it, one thing shines through every part of his speech, and that is that he did not want the Committee on Agriculture to report any new legislation which might in any way authorize any kind of an appropriation for any new undertakings whatever, or for any others that were not already undertaken and well established. Oh, he was cautious——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JONES of Texas. I can not yield. I have not the time to yield. I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman must confine himself to the truth when he quotes me.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am going to, in quoting from the gentleman from Wyoming. I expect to read the report of the stenographer's notes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want him to do that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will do that, and if it does not bear me out the House will judge of that fact.

The gentleman from Wyoming was cautious. He traveled all the way out to Wyoming to throw bouquets to the farmers. But after using enough verbal persiflage to cover about 16 typewritten pages he finally arrived at his destination and made this statement, which I am going to read. I will just read it direct from the stenographer's report in order that there may be no mistake about what it says. The gentleman from Wyoming had referred to some other measures, and then was evidently talking along general lines, when he used this language, and I ask you to note it carefully:

Whatever the merits are, this is not the time to consider any additional drains on the Federal Treasury, except for the carrying out of policies now undertaken and well established and proven in furtherance of purposes that seem to be essential to the restoration of prosperous conditions.

You will note the gentleman would limit the Committee on Agriculture to the carrying out of policies already undertaken which are "well established and proven." If that language has any meaning at all it means that the gentleman from Wyoming as floor leader was practically pronouncing the death knell of any legislation which the Committee on Agriculture might report which authorized any kind of an appropriation unless the work was already undertaken, already well established, and already proven.

It also means the death knell to the recommendations of the Agricultural Commission, which spent months investigating and which made numerous recommendations. What is to become of the results of the agricultural conference? That conference was called with a blare of trumpets and was a rather spectacular affair. The President went before that conference and made a "big" speech. I do not know whether the administration leaders like the recommendations made by the conference—I am sure they liked the publicity which they got out of it—but one thing is certain, and that is that the tactful way to destroy those recommendations is not to fight them directly, but to deny the necessary appropriations for the functioning of the activities that would take place under the recommendations if they should be carried out.

There are 10 recommendations set out by the Agricultural Commission, most of which call for legislation of a new character and most of which call for an appropriation on projects "not well established and not yet proven" and in many instances not yet undertaken.

I sympathize, and I am sure every member of the Committee on Agriculture sympathizes, with any effort at proper economy; but why pick on agriculture? Why start such a program with the committee that represents the farming interests of this country and which authorizes relatively an exceedingly small part of the appropriations of the Congress? The Agricultural appropriation bill carries less than one-fiftieth of the appropriations of the Congress, and yet a large portion of our citizens are farmers. I favor and have voted for tremendous cuts in appropriations, and I am against many of the large appropriations that have been made, but this is an attempt in the wrong place.

The gentleman from Wyoming may have gone before some other exclusive committees with an hour and a half speech urging that no more legislation be reported, but I have not heard of it if he did so. However that may be, the fact remains that this Congress has appropriated large sums for other purposes.

I do know that this Congress passed large appropriations for the railways, and while the gentleman from Wyoming has been floor leader we have authorized the refunding of what the railways owe us and authorized the payment of what we owe the railroads. I know that recently we appropriated more than $100,000,000 for the Shipping Board, with its high-priced officers and its 78 lawyers.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I regret I can not yield. I have not the time.

I know this, that hardly had the echo of the voice of the gentleman from Wyoming died out of the committee room in which he gave utterance to what I read to you awhile ago until the President of the United States came on the floor of this House—the same day—and urged the appropriation of $30,000,000 annually as a subsidy to the big shipowners.

In view of this and other facts, it seemed strange that this should occur, because the gentleman from Wyoming was talking until nearly 12 o'clock about cutting down on agriculture and the President just after 12 o'clock was telling the Congress to make annual appropriations as a subsidy to the shipowners. Was there any connection between the two? Was it necessary to lop off a few paltry dollars from agriculture in order to subsidize the few shipping interests of this country?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I regret I have not the time. I wish I could yield. I have only 15 minutes. I need more time than that.

Now, what is the attitude of the Republican Party generally toward the farmer? Everyone knows his plight. Everyone knows that farm products for months have been selling below the cost of production and that the men who have devoted their lives to these activities are in a deplorable state.

The Republican Party all along has rendered lip service to the farmers. They have been protesting their love for them. During the last campaign they walked down lovers' lane hand in hand with the farmer and whispered honeyed phrases in his ear. They sent him corsage bouquets of promises and uttered words that fell like liquid music on his ear, and they are willing to give him promises to-day.

Now, I just want to read to you again what the gentleman said in connection with the recommendations of the Agricultural Commission:

> Whatever the merits are, this is not the time to consider any additional drains on the Federal Treasury except for the carrying out of policies now undertaken and well established and proven in the furtherance of purposes that seem to be essential to the restoration of prosperous conditions.

The Agricultural Commission made a number of recommendations, and the agricultural conference, among other things, ratified the recommendations of the commission. That commission recommended that there should be a warehouse system which would provide a uniform liability on the part of warehousemen in which the moral and financial hazards would be fully insured. To this end the commission suggested the extension of the existing Federal warehouse law. In order to carry out this recommendation some appropriation must be authorized, and yet after the commission had made that recommendation the gentleman, it seems to me, undertakes to smother the activity by declaring against any authorizations for the purpose of carrying out any new proposals.

Again the commission recommended that there should be an extension of the statistical divisions of the Department of Agriculture. But after making the recommendation the floor leader slips over to the Committee on Agriculture and practically puts a ban on any legislation which would carry that activity into effect. It would take a very small amount of money to carry out its recommendations; but, no, we must feed the farmers on phrases in order to save money to contribute to the interest of the Shipping Board and the railroads. And, as a matter of fact, shining through the fine phrases which the gentleman used was the inevitable conclusion to which you are inexorably driven by the gentleman's language, that he wanted no legislation that would call for additional appropriations for any new activities for the relief of agriculture. I claim that is a natural inference from the language. If I am not justified, well and good.

But the next provision is that provision should be made by Congress for agricultural attachés in the principal foreign countries producing and consuming agricultural products. That most certainly would call for new legislation. Now, what did they mean when they called this conference, with all the agitation and publicity that accompanied it? I do not know what may have been the purpose with reference to this legislation, but I do know, gentlemen, that a very effective way to destroy these recommendations is to choke down the appropriations essential to the functioning of those activities. Is not that true?

During 1917 there was an old darkey who heard much talk about patriotism. It was new to him, and he said, "Boss, what's all this patriotism stuff what I hears so much about? What is patriotism, anyway?" The white man replied, "Why, Sam, patriotism is a man's love for his country. If a man is willing to fight for his country and die for his country he has patriotism. You would be willing to die for your country, wouldn't you?" The Negro studied a minute and said, "No, sah; I'se fooled around town so much the last few years I don't care nothin' much about the country." [Laughter.] These gentlemen of the Republican Party have fooled around big business interests so much in the last few years that they do not care much about the country and the country people in so far as doing anything practical is concerned. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I am simply putting before you the recommendations of this commission, created since the Republicans have been in control of the Congress, which commission has done much of its work since the present President has been in the chair. An additional recommendation of that commission is as follows:

> That adequate Federal appropriations should be made for the promotion of better book and record keeping of the costs of production of farm products on the basis of the farm unit as a basis for the development of more efficient methods of farm management.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to my colleague five minutes more.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is another recommendation that would come under the plan of the gentleman's logic, and thus would fall by the wayside.

Now, gentlemen, I do not undertake to say whether all of these recommendations should be carried out, but I do say that it is not fair to create a commission and have it make recommendations and have a conference of farmers or so-called farmers from all over the Union come to this town and ratify those recommendations and then not undertake to carry out any of them.

Another recommendation which the commission made was a provision for the extension and coordination of a program of a practical and scientific investigation through State and National departments of agriculture and through agricultural colleges and universities directed toward the reduction of hazards of climate and weather conditions and of plant and animal diseases and insect pests. Of course, this would carry some additional authorization.

I may have misunderstood the somewhat nebulous language of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and I may not be justified in my conclusions, but I understood that he specifically condemned a bill which would have carried out substantially that recommendation.

Again, the commission recommended:

> More adequate wholesale terminal facilities, particularly for handling perishables at primary markets, and a more thorough organization of the agencies and facilities of distribution of the large consuming centers of the country.

That is a bouquet which the ardent lover of the farmer promises to send and then, secretly in his own mind, refuses to send.

Another recommendation was:

> The development of better roads to local markets, joint facilities at terminals connecting rail, water, and motor transport systems, and more adequate facilities at shipping points, with a view to reducing the cost of marketing and distribution.

A fine chance those recommendations have, in view of the attitude of the floor leader of the Republican Party of this Congress! Those recommendations vanish into thin air when submitted to the flaming crucible of the Republican tests which are applied to the legislation reported out of the committee—the tests of the party that is already wedded to big business, and therefore seems to feel that it could not take on another bride without being guilty of bigamy.

Now, my friends, what is it that they mean by taking these contrary positions? They first tell the farmers—and they give broad and wide publicity to that statement—"We are going to do all we can to support and further the interests of agriculture," and then in a quiet sort of a way, to which no publicity whatever is given, after the recommendations are made, the floor leader walks over to the Agricultural Committee, the channel through which legislation of this character must necessarily come in reaching the House, and, as I construe his language, in effect says, "Stay, boys, stay; we can not carry out these recommendations." It reminds me a little bit of the old Negro who fell out of a peach tree and broke his leg. Instead of going to a doctor he went to a veterinarian, who set his leg all right, but he made the mistake of turning it so that the foot pointed backward, and after that the old Negro could steal all the chickens he wanted to, because no one could trail him or tell which way he was going. [Laughter.] The gentleman evidently intends to get away with almost anything by making his trail go both ways. Here are the recommendations in black and white, practically every one of which would come within the ban of the exact language which I read to you, according to my construction of it. I claim if you will read it, if the gentleman places it in the RECORD, you will probably agree with me.

The gentleman has been holding it out for revision. I tried to get a printed copy of it last week, but I could not get it, and I had to go to the stenographer's notes. It may be turned in now, but I was informed by the clerk of the committee the day before yesterday that it had not been turned in yet.

The commission made another recommendation:

> The commission believes that an immediate reduction of freight rates on farm products is absolutely necessary to a renewal of normal agricultural operations and prosperity, and recommends prompt action by the railroads and constituted public authority to that end.

My friends, I have just read you from a copy some of the recommendations of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas 10 minutes more.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thank my friend. Why are the recommendations, a part of which I have read and nearly all of which call for appropriations with reference to policies that are not well established and that are not thoroughly proven—otherwise, why are they ignored and why have the conference at all? If the gentleman can show that his language does not mean the thing that I have construed it to mean, if all of these recommendations by the commission and all of the recommendations by the conference are simply an extension of the activities already undertaken and well proved and established, what did the commission and the conference accomplish, and what was the use of having them?

Now, my friends, with reference to the railroad question: We passed a law here some time ago for the purpose of turning the roads back to the owners. It would take about four or five lines to do that, but we passed a bill containing 79 pages. Some of the legislation might have been necessary, it being a new project. But it seems to me that in the practical working of it we might have found some changes that should be made. That is my view, but I understand the view taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that no changes should be made, at least for the present. I know that no changes have been reported by the appropriate committees of this Congress. I do not know whether the gentleman went before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and made the same speech that he made to our committee. If he did not go to the other big committees it seems to me that he was going far afield to talk about the meager appropriations for agriculture and stop there without going to the others. And if he did go, I wonder what his attitude was with reference to them.

It is absolutely essential that there be an adjustment of the present system of railroad rates, which are so high as to destroy a great portion of the traffic. Unless this is done the whole agricultural geography of the United States must be rewritten and placed on a different basis. One important step in this direction is to repeal the present law with reference to rate making and to restore, at least for the present, the control as it existed under prewar conditions.

On every side is heard a complaint of the high rates, especially as they apply to agricultural products and to live stock. The Interstate Commerce Commission is literally swamped with petitions and applications for reduction in freight rates. The only reductions that have been made, in so far as I have been able to learn, have been those that were voluntarily agreed to by the railways. There may have been some others, but they have been relatively few. In other words, since the enactment of the present law the making of rates has been practically in the hands of the railroads themselves. This does not seem to be fair in any sense. It would not be fair to permit the rates to be fixed wholly by the shipping and consuming public. They would perhaps want rates at practically nothing. On the other hand, it is manifestly unfair to let the railways fix rates and to have reductions only when they file voluntary schedules asking for reductions, because while the public would like to have free transportation, on the other hand the railways naturally want rates that produce the greatest revenue. Somewhere between these two extremes there should be a middle ground, where rates could be fixed that would be fair alike to the public and to the railroads. Yet in so far as I have been able to observe, they have been fixed practically by the railways themselves, and in their anxiety to get the rates high enough to suit themselves they have gotten them almost so high as to destroy themselves.

It is not so much the fault of the Interstate Commerce Commission as of the law itself, imposing, as it does, upon them the impracticable duty of fixing both intrastate and interstate rates, thus placing a greater burden upon them than anybody of its present membership can attend to. In the multitude of applications that come to them they have been relying in a large measure upon data and statistics furnished by the railroads themselves. But, even if the commission were a large enough body to do all the work that is placed upon them, as a practical proposition the giving of them charge of local rates and rate making makes a system that becomes absolutely unwieldy. Under the old system, if a local rate were too high, application could be made to the local commission and an adjudication had within a very short period of time by a body that kept in touch with the local conditions and which could get the facts much more quickly and accurately than any far-away commission can possibly do. As it is now, when a local rate is complained of the complaint is lost in a sea of other applications and the local shipper and producer can only cry for relief and has no language but a cry.

When a Texas producer in shipping vegetables is compelled to pay four or five times as much in freight rates as his produce brings there is something radically wrong. When a Texas farmer or a farmer from any other State is compelled to pay more for his freight rates than his corn or his milo maize will net him, when he has incurred the expense, done the labor, and suffered from the uncertainties of the season, a condition exists which must be remedied.

I have had letters showing that it costs more to ship horses from the Panhandle of Texas to Oklahoma than the horses would bring; that it costs as much to ship a carload of fruit from California to Texas as the fruit is worth; that corn must be burned for fuel because it can not be sold for enough to pay the shipping, and that the rates are so high that it makes it more economical to burn corn than to buy coal. Thousands of tons of vegetables rotted in the fields of Texas last year because of this condition, and much of the production of that and of other States—for what is true of Texas is true of other agricultural States—is sold below the cost of production.

Prior to the war we had the finest system of railroads that existed on the face of the earth. We had developed under the dual system of interstate and State commissions. Anyone who had a real complaint to make could always get a hearing and an early decision. But as the same has been managed since the passage of the present law it has been just as bad as if there had been no commission, for if rates are to be fixed only on voluntary acts by the railways themselves what boots it to have an Interstate Commerce Commission?

There must be a change if agriculture, business, and industry are to survive. Either we must go back to the old dual system or devise an entirely new system whereby a body will be established for rate making that will make rates that will be fair alike to the public as well as to the railroads.

There has been considerable complaint by officials in the administration of the so-called "farm bloc," and that an effort has been made to get them to desist. It seems strange that no complaint has been made of the manufacturers' bloc, the railway bloc, or the various other interests represented here. These others are not called "blocs," but they stand together in absolute unity, and if one is called upon the legislative carpet for a lecture, why should not the others be? The fact that the others stand together makes it essential that those representing the agricultural sections also work in unison in order that their rights may be in a measure maintained and secured.

From the early history of this country, from the time when Israel Putnam deserted his plow in the field, mounted his horse, and fought for the defense of his country, the farmer has been in the vanguard of battle and has always done his part in every national activity. Here comes a great party into power, creates a commission, calls a conference, has a wonderful demonstration, and then stops short, and stops, it seems to me, very unfairly. I ask the Members of this House if, in their judgment, it is fair and just to allow a thing of this kind to go by unchallenged. I ask any of the gentlemen on that side who may undertake to reply to make an explanation of what I have read in connection with the recommendations of the agricultural conference. I ask you to place alongside in the deadly parallel the recommendations of the commission and the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming and then reach your own conclusions. If you will do this I believe you will say that I am fully justified in reaching the conclusions I have stated, and that it is idle to expect any material relief for the interests of agriculture from the party now in power. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is evident the speech of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] did not fill the bill, and we are therefore edified by a speech from the gentleman from Texas, which it is hoped will fill the bill by providing a campaign document in the campaign against the majority leader, Mr. MONDELL. The trouble with the gentleman from Texas is that he did not add the last chapter to his story. He has read the recommendation of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry. Every recommendation which that commission made has either been carried out or is in the process of being carried out or is covered by an increased appropriation in this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The first of those recommendations was for the passage of the cooperative marketing bill. That bill has been passed.

The second of the recommendations was for an adequate rural credit law. That bill has been introduced and hearings are set for it in the Senate for to-morrow, Friday, and I understand that hearings will soon be had by the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

The third recommendation was for a national warehousing system and more adequate appropriations for carrying the national warehouse law into effect. An additional appropriation for that purpose is carried in this bill.

The fourth recommendation is for an immediate reduction in freight rates, and since the recommendation was made there have been reductions in freight rates on agricultural products aggregating more than $240,000,000 a year. [Applause on Republican side.]

The fifth recommendation was for an extension of the statistical divisions of the Department of Agriculture, particularly along the lines of procurement of live-stock statistics. An additional appropriation is carried in this bill to carry out that recommendation.

The sixth recommendation is for a provision for agricultural attachés in the principal foreign countries producing and consuming agricultural products. A small additional appropriation is made to carry out that purpose in this bill.

The seventh recommendation is for the development by trade associations and by State and Federal sanction of more accurate, uniform, and practical grades of agricultural products and standards of containers for the same. That does not call for legislation, but provision is made in this bill for continuing that work.

The eighth recommendation is for adequate Federal appropriations for the promotion of better book and record keeping on the part of farmers. While this bill does not carry, in terms, an added appropriation for that work, as a matter of fact that work is being expanded, because the total amount of the appropriation available for this purpose last year was not expended and will be expended in the next fiscal year.

The ninth recommendation is for an extended and coordinated program of practical and scientific investigation through State and national departments of agriculture and through agricultural colleges and universities, directed toward reducing the hazards of climate and weather conditions and of plant and animal diseases and insect pests. Appropriation after appropriation, carrying additional amounts for the elimination and control of animal and plant diseases, in cooperation with all the States of the Union, are carried in this bill in direct conformity with that recommendation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. How did the gentleman give increased appropriations for all these things and yet reduce the total appropriations carried in the bill of last year?

Mr. ANDERSON. We have done it by taking them off where they do not need them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The tenth recommendation is for more adequate wholesale terminal facilities, particularly for handling perishables at primary markets and a more thorough organization of the agencies and facilities of distribution of the large consuming centers of the country. That is a matter almost exclusively within the domain of the States, and was so contemplated by the commission when it made its recommendations.

The eleventh recommendation is for development of better roads to local markets, and in this bill we are carrying an additional amount designed to improve the method of road construction, and there is now under way a continuing program of Federal aid to road construction in the United States.

The rest of these recommendations I do not need to read, because they relate to matters the solution of which is more or less the result of the cooperation of all the elements combined rather than of legislation. I mention these things because it seems to me it is fair that the House and the country should understand that something has been done and is being done to carry out the recommendations which the commission made.

As a result of the wise, constructive, and far-seeing program inaugurated by this administration and proposed by the commission there is everywhere indication of improving agricultural conditions. The credit situation is gradually being relieved. Freight rates on farm products have been reduced and further reductions are in prospect. Prices of agricultural products are showing continued improvement. The price of corn has increased from 17 cents to 50 cents a bushel; wheat from $1 to $1.40 per bushel. The fat lambs, cattle, and hogs have shown similiar improvement. While, on the other hand, reductions in consumers' prices are slowly but steadily bringing the farmers' dollar to its prewar purchasing power.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the ides of November are eight months away, but the campaign is already on. It started the other day down among the canebrakes of Louisiana and has finally gotten up to the short-grass country of Texas.

A MEMBER (on the Democratic side). And Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the campaign is directed toward the coming senatorial campaign in Wyoming. That is very patent and evident to everyone.

There are a good many different brands of demagogy. I think the cheapest and most indefensible brand is that which assumes that the people are simple-minded enough that all that it is necessary to do is to invoke the name of a good cause and then assume that everything urged on behalf of it, to the bottom of the Treasury and to the extent of the Federal authority, is commendable. Certain gentlemen make a specialty of the farmer, and while they may never have farmed except to farm the farmer, and while they may know nothing and care less about agriculture, inasmuch as the farmer is perhaps the most highly esteemed of all classes of our people, they indulge in demagogy by claiming to be the particular champion of the farmer and by attempting to create the impression that other people are not friendly to him. That may go where the percentage of illiteracy is low, it may go where people do not hear unbiased political discussion, but it does not go in the country which I have the honor to represent or much of the country thereabout.

Those in position of considerable responsibility are not able to, at least they should not, indulge in the luxury that some gentlemen are tempted to indulge in, of camouflaging with regard to their views and purposes and assuming and pretending to be for anything and everything that may temporarily or locally seem popular. A man in a position of considerable responsibility, if he is worthy of his responsibility, must play his game in the open, and it must be known to all men what he stands for and why he stands for it. One of the duties of the position which I occupy is that of endeavoring to carry out the will and the wish and the purpose of the majority representatives of the party to which I belong, and the will and the wish and the purpose of that party is to overcome the frightful handicaps of the conditions that were bequeathed to us as the result of a great war and the grievous and countless mistakes of the Democratic administration, and to endeavor to restore prosperity to the Republic and its people and to bring conditions back to normal.

ABUNDANT PROVISION WITH ECONOMY.

While abundantly providing for every essential activity that may properly be aided by the Federal Government, it is our duty to keep the sum total of appropriations at the lowest figure consistent with good service and within the Nation's income. In doing that, it is necessary for one in my position, if he does his duty, to talk with members of committees relative to legislation and appropriations pending before them, to frequently, on the floor of the House and elsewhere, advise, advocate, and insist upon economy. I hope that as floor leader I have not forfeited the privilege of appearing before committees to express my views. In fact, I believe it to be my duty, especially when invited to appear before committees, to urge such action as will properly promote the progress and development of the country and is essential to the restoration of prosperity. At the same time it is my duty to advise that we avoid unnecessary, uncalled-for, and nonhelpful expenditures of the public money.

I have frequently appeared before committees, I have talked to many Members relative to these matters, but no member of the Democratic minority assumed to take special notice of that or complain about it until I appeared before the Committee on Agriculture to discuss certain matters pending before that committee.

Having done this, lo! it dawned upon the minds of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] that here was a wondrous opportunity in the name of the farmer to assail the floor leader. While I do not claim undue credit, I hope that I have had my proper part in the legislation of this Congress, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that no legislative body ever sat on earth which in the same length of time did so much for the farmer and the stock raiser as this Congress has done. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I have favored it, all of it, and have so far as I was able to do aided and advanced it.

SPLENDID RECORD IN AID OF AGRICULTURE.

The emergency tariff that so greatly benefited the grain raisers and cattle growers and sheep growers of the country, that restored to something like reasonable figures the prices of the great staples of agriculture; the packer bill, passed in the face of the opposition of the radicals, especially in another body, placing upon the statute books sound, sane, and sanitary measures of regulation affecting the great packing and allied industries; the antigambling in grain futures bill, originating in the House and now upon the statute books; the farmers' cooperative marketing act, which passed the House many months ago, lay for a long time in a comatose condition in the Senate, and finally, through pressure from the House, was resurrected and is now on the statute books. [Applause on the Republican side.] The legislation amending the war finance act, under which many millions of dollars have been loaned to the farmers and stockmen of the South and West, saving, actually saving, in a crisis the stock-growing business of the country; saving it temporarily for the men engaged in it, saving it permanently for the benefit of the entire people of the Union. [Applause on the Republican side.]

These and many other provisions of legislation have been placed upon the statute books which have mightily aided in the restoration of the agricultural industries of the country. Some folks have attempted to create the impression that this legislation, so helpful to the farmer, has been the outcome of the efforts of a group or alleged group from agricultural sections of the country. Most of this legislation originated in the House, where no one has pretended there was group action. This legislation, helpful to the farmers, has been reported from a number of committees and has had the support of Republicans from every section of the Union. It is not bloc but Republican legislation, and there has in every case been a Republican majority for it.

So far as our Democratic friends have supported our program they have evidenced good judgment or good political sense, but it would not have been enacted except for the Republican majority. The other day a member of the Committee on Agriculture, with whom I was discussing some bills before that committee, suggested that some of them if now enacted into law would lay burdens upon the Federal Treasury hardly justified under the policy we are following at this time, and I expressed a willingness to appear before the committee and make some observations touching some of that legislation. That appearance has been heralded forth by the gentleman from Louisiana and the gentleman from Texas as an assault upon the farmer.

What were the bills before that committee relative to which I made certain observations? The first bill I referred to before the committee I favored. It was a real farmers' bill. It proposes to save to farmers in Montana and the Dakotas, thousands of them, everything that they have on earth, and the gentleman from Louisiana and the gentleman from Texas not only opposed it, as presented here the other day, but the gentleman from Texas, who has just spoken, assaulted it viciously and temporarily helped to defeat it, a bill proposing a loan to furnish seed grain to the drought-stricken farmers of the Northwest, a practical measure, to help men try another year at least a real, practical experiment. We proposed to help the men who are actually doing the job.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. To enable men to extend agriculture in the Northwest and to hold aloft the standards of our civilization on those frontiers where we are fighting drought and hard and unfavorable conditions. [Applause on the Republican side.] I can not yield.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement and not yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Louisiana did vote for that particular measure, I modify my statement, but I stand on my statement as to the record of the gentleman from Texas, who did vote and speak against it.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman from Wyoming did not indorse the bill before the committee. He expressed a carload of sympathy, but that is all; but he did not say a word about favoring it.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming——

Mr. ASWELL. Expressed sympathy, but did not say the bill should be passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, of course, there is a distinction, and if that pleases the gentleman, all well and good. I made the arrangement under which the bill was brought before the House and voted upon. However the gentleman voted, the majority on his side voted against it. I made an earnest appeal for the bill, and still the gentleman from Louisiana is not satisfied.

Mr. ASWELL. I would like to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further.

Mr. ASWELL. The entire Louisiana delegation voted for the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad a majority of the Louisiana delegation was right.

One measure before the Agricultural Committee, the passage of which I opposed at least at this time, on the occasion which my friends from Louisiana and Texas are trying to make famous, was a measure which proposed an enormous expenditure, the ultimate limit of which no man can measure, for the care through Federal expenditure of private forest lands. I made no special argument against the bill, though one can easily be made. I did say that at this time we could not afford to start on any such experiment and expenditure as that. There was a bill before the committee proposing to add to the Federal expenditures in connection with agricultural experimental stations a sum amounting to about $5,000,000 per annum ultimately. I gave testimony to the value and benefits of the work of the stations, but said that in my opinion this was no time for that increased expenditure.

I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] for having quoted my statement in summing up my position. I stand by it. One of my general statements was:

> I do not think that under present conditions we are justified in enlarging Federal activities at the expense of the Federal Treasury beyond what we are already pledged to, except where there is something in the nature of an emergency.

Among the bills before the committee there was one, as I have said, proposing to expend enormous amounts of Federal money for taking care of other people's forest lands; another that proposed an expenditure of a million dollars for the buying of forest lands.

I said, and the gentleman from Texas quoted me as follows:

> Whatever the merits of these measures are, this is not the time to consider any additional drains on the Federal Treasury except for the carrying out of policies now undertaken, well established, and well proven, or in furtherance of purposes that seem essential to the restoration of prosperous conditions.

I stand by that declaration, and both party platforms indorsed the view there expressed.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. Why did the gentleman deem it necessary to go before the Committee on Agriculture to make a statement at all? Why was it necessary to go?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas is too old a Member of Congress, and he knows the procedure here too well, to have asked that question in absolute good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that it is my duty, as it is his as one of the leaders on his side, to advise against policies he does not believe to be in the public interest. And I am particularly charged with responsibility now of attempting to keep the public expenditures within the public income. I appear before committees repeatedly and discuss legislative matters with members of committees time after time, and it occurred to no one to question it until someone somewhere, probably outside of this Chamber, suggested to some gentleman in the Chamber that here was a chance to play a little politics by assuming that the floor leader must not appear before the Agricultural Committee, wherever else he might make his arguments. Useless and unnecessary public expenditure for the care and preservation of private timberlands is just as unnecessary and just as useless and just as indefensible if reported out by the Committee on Agriculture as it would be if it were reported out by any other committee of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

An expenditure that is not justified or necessary acquires no merit in the minds of anyone, except somebody playing a demagogic game, because it happens to be reported out of some particular committee of the House. I repeat, we have done more for agriculture, directly and indirectly, in appropriations and in legislation, than any Congress that ever sat under this Dome or anywhere else on earth, and we have done it as a party and not as members of blocs or groups. And we shall do everything necessary and essential and proper from a Federal standpoint to advance this great and useful and essential national industry.

WORK OF JOINT AGRICULTURAL COMMISSION.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], after having found fault with my attitude in trying to avoid useless and unnecessary expenditure, turned his attention to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], chairman of the subcommittee and in charge of this bill and chairman of the Joint Agricultural Commission, and was rash enough to declare that certain recommendations of the commission had not been complied with and would and could not be complied with if we adhered to the attitude of economy which I had outlined.

The answer to these assertions of the gentleman from Texas just made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is so complete and conclusive that it ought to discourage the gentleman from making assertions that can not be sustained. The gentleman from Minnesota, after noting the purely political character of the speeches of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], put a complete extinguisher on the latter's assertions by calling attention to the fact that every recommendation of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry "has either been carried out or is in the process of being carried out or is covered by an increased appropriation by this bill." Then the gentleman from Minnesota proceeded in detail to tell how this had been done.

The cooperative marketing bill which the commission recommended has become a law. In fact it had passed the House long before; the commission was simply urging the Senate. The recommendation for an adequate rural credit law has been followed by the introduction of bills and by an arrangement for hearings. The recommendation relative to warehousing for agricultural products is met by an additional appropriation under the bill we are considering. Since the recommendation for reduced freight rates was made, freight rates on agricultural products have been reduced in the sum of $240,000,000 per annum, and more reductions are in sight.

The recommendations for increased live-stock statistics and for agricultural inquiries abroad in the interest of larger markets find a response in increased appropriations carried on this bill. The recommendation relative to improved standards of agricultural products and providing for uniformity in products and in containers for the same is not only met by appropriations in this bill, but so far as standards are concerned by measures now before the Congress from another committee. The recommendation for an extended and coordinated program for practical and scientific investigation toward reducing the hazards of climate and eradicating plant and animal diseases and insect pests finds its response in many items of the bill before us.

THE EVEN TENOR OF OUR HELPFUL WAY.

The gentleman from Minnesota concluded his complete refutation of the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas that we were not proceeding actively and successfully in our work in the interest of agriculture in the following clear and convincing statement made just before I took the floor:

> As a result of the wise, constructive, and far-seeing program inaugurated by this administration and proposed by the commission, there is everywhere indication of improving agricultural conditions. The credit situation is gradually being relieved. Freight rates on farm products have been reduced, and further reductions are in prospect. Prices of agricultural products are showing continued improvement. The price of corn has increased from 17 cents to 50 cents a bushel; wheat from $1 to $1.40 per bushel. The fat lambs, cattle, and hogs have shown similar improvement, while, on the other hand, reductions in consumers' prices are slowly but steadily bringing the farmers' dollar to its prewar purchasing power.

Ours has been the party that has placed agriculture on a sound, sane, and stable basis. [Applause on the Republican side.] Recognizing the great usefulness of agriculture to the people, we shall pursue the even tenor of our helpful way, unaffected by the demagoguery of those who claim to want to plunge us into unnecessary expenditure on the theory that it is to aid agriculture or the farmer.

Mr. GARNER. I want to state to the gentleman that I know his wonderful influence in bringing about results. I want to suggest to him if he could come before the Ways and Means Committee he could do a power of good. As to legislation for the farmer, does he intend to pass an amendment to the Federal reserve law, which does not cost a dollar in the world, requiring agriculture to be represented in the Federal system? Do you intend to pass that legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the proper administration of the law and with the present Republican President in the White House, agriculture will be represented on that board, not by one man but by the practical knowledge and sympathetic efforts of every member. [Applause on the Republican side, the Members rising.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On March 8, 1922:

H. R. 244. An act to provide for the disposition of abandoned portions of rights of way granted to railroad companies;

H. R. 5013. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the inscription of titles upon certain monuments, tablets, or other memorials;

H. R. 7158. An act to amend the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor;

H. R. 8842. An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska; and

H. R. 10185. An act authorizing the exchange of lands within the exterior boundaries of the Malheur National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has 22 minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] 41 minutes remaining.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming made so many general statements, as usual, and said so little definitely that I think I will not need five minutes in which to reply.

A bill came to the Committee on Agriculture carrying $5,000,000 for the suffering, drought-stricken people in the West. The gentleman from Wyoming came before the committee and was asked numerous questions, and finally, on about the fifteenth page, some one asked him how he stood on that bill. He started in by expressing sympathy for the drought-stricken people in his own part of the country, and before he left expressing a carload of sympathy, but never said at any time that he was for the bill; but being close to that territory, living in Wyoming, he supported it on the floor of the House, as I did myself.

It is most extraordinary that a gentleman informed as the gentleman from Wyoming should be should stand here and make a statement for public consumption by declaring that his party in power had done so much for the farmer, when it was in power for 30 years and during the entire time failed to pass a farm loan act or a warehouse bill. It did not occur to you then that the farmer was a factor in this Nation's life. You do not look to him for your campaign funds, but in your legislation you look to big business and special privilege for your campaign funds. So the farmer heretofore has not counted for very much with the Republican Party.

He boasts of the packers' bill and the grain futures bill. They were before the Committee on Agriculture for many weeks, and I supported both of them, because it became evident that they were the best bills that could be gotten from a Republican-controlled Congress; and it is a fact undisputed and known to every man familiar with the facts of record that the packers' bill had the consistent and persistent support of the packers and that the grain futures bill was heartily supported and amended by the grain gamblers. There is no question about that. These laws do not help the farmer or grower of live stock.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. I decline to yield.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Wyoming makes the assertion that by my calling the attention of this House to his unusual and extraordinary visit to the Committee on Agriculture to assault the farmer-aid bills before it was done by me for political purposes in Wyoming. I am frank to say—and I think I have a reputation here as a gentleman whose word is worth something—that it never occurred to me that MONDELL was trying to be Senator in Wyoming.

It was as foreign from my thoughts as it is possible to conceive. If I had known or thought of it I would not have been uneasy about his winning the senatorship in Wyoming from the present Democratic Senator, because the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has forsaken the progressive spirit of the great West and has allied himself completely and uniformly with the stand-pat reactionaries in your party. You know that is true, that he has lost the confidence and support of progressive Republicans; and you know, furthermore, that I have no concern about that.

Why did I bring that matter of his trip to the Committee on Agriculture to the attention of this House? This is the reason: I had an earnest and heartfelt interest in that great bill introduced by a Republican Member, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], to enlarge and make efficient and valuable the experiment stations in the various States of this Union, and that bill has the indorsement of every farm organization in this country.

It has the indorsement—the principle was actually indorsed—by your farm conference, and therefore I speak the exact truth when I say that the bill that the gentleman from Wyoming slipped into that committee to assault and to strangle and not permit you to consider has the support of 40,000,000 people in this country, and yet he presumes to come into that Committee on Agriculture and assault it in the back and strangle it, if possible, by frightening Republican leaders of that committee from reporting the bill to this House.

That is the reason why I made this statement to the House, and I have no apology to make. I will go on the stump, if need be, and present the truth, as backed up by the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, made before the Committee on Agriculture assaulting the pending bills to aid the farmers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KNIGHT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman, if I have not completed my remarks when my time expires, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to extend them in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes that request now, I presume?

Mr. KNIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote the time at my disposal to an argument against the soldier bonus bill.

The Congress of the United States must soon decide what in my humble judgment is the most important question that has come before this session. The proposal of this body to vote a bonus to the service men of the World War I regard as most unsound from any standpoint from which it is examined. Indeed, it is indefensible, whether we apply to it the logic of economics or that of patriotism. In reaching this conclusion I wish it distinctly understood that I have no patience with those who, having amassed great fortunes out of the war, now sneeringly characterize these men as Treasury raiders wholly lacking in the right spirit of patriotism. These service men may be misled, and I think they are, but we must remember that when a man no longer has means on which to live, and finds the gates of employment shut upon his honest efforts to get work, he is not in the most favorable position to judge soundly any question that promises to put a few dollars in his pocket.

These men remember the fulsome promises of factory managers when they went forth, as they were told to make the world safe for democracy, that their positions would be there awaiting them on their return. And now that they have found strangers in their old jobs—have found that those who bedecked them in the habiliments of heroes, turn a cold eye and an indifferent ear upon their just claims for consideration—they would be more than human if they failed to resent it.

It is for this, if for no other reason, that we should now appeal to the service man, not as a Treasury raider, but as an American citizen, who, when he understands the facts, will face them with the same patriotic sacrifice that he displayed when he willingly risked his life in the service of his country.

I realize there will be many who will ask the not unreasonable question why he should again be called upon to stand with empty hands while the 20,000 new war millionaires sun themselves in the luxury of the wealth that disgraces those who amassed it out of their country's necessities. No such conditions should ever have existed. The whole man power of the country should have been conscripted. Capital should have been conscripted along with labor, and not a dollar should have been made by anyone out of the war. But no such conditions obtained. Indeed, if they ever do, then in all the countries of the world the hinges on the doors of the war temples will grow red with rust, and the banners of battle will lie forever folded in the silent places of peace.

Furthermore, I want to say here and now that I wish it were possible to lay a capital tax sufficient to pay its entire cost on the men who made fortunes out of this war. [Applause.] But that can not be done, and we must face the facts as we find them. War means not only destruction and death but an ensuing demoralization that prevents any country from doing full justice to the living. The ragged Continentals starved at Valley Forge, reddened the snows of the North with bleeding feet and laid down their lives from Ticonderoga to Yorktown to establish freedom on the North American Continent, and yet the Government made possible by their sacrifice could offer no reward to the living commensurate with the sacrifices of either the living or the dead.

When before overwhelming force the thin gray line broke and the stars and bars went down at Appomattox, the great race that had suffered and endured all things and had made the most gallant fight in history, went back to ruined homes and the graves of their dead, content with the imperishable memories of the sacrifice which they had made for a cause they believed was right. [Applause.] And the men who saved the Union felt that in their service to the country they had a reward which time could not stale. When, 10 years later, some of their ill-advised friends had succeeded in getting through Congress a bonus bill, their great leader, who was then President, promptly vetoed it. Neither the fame of the Grand Army nor the finances of the country, he said, should be subjected to such an assault, and Gen. Grant sent the bill back with his disapproval.

I have said that the bonus legislation is indefensible from either the economic or the patriotic standpoint. Let us get down to facts.

The war has left us a heritage of debt which now amounts to $23,000,000,000. That is a burden of $1,000 on every family in the United States. Our interest charges are over a billion dollars a year, and State and Federal taxation in one form or another is laying another blighting weight of perhaps $350 on every family in the country. The result of all this has been to demoralize the business of the country almost to the breaking point. Indeed, it is wholly useless to look for any substantial or permanent revival of business, and consequently the disappearance of the vast unemployment rife throughout the land, until we take at least some of these burdens off the backs of the tax-ridden people.

Instead of doing this, we now propose to do exactly the contrary. We propose to pass a bill that inevitably must exaggerate the dangerous conditions in which the country is now placed. If anybody knows the extent of this new burden, I have not yet met him. Secretary Mellon has estimated it at $3,300,000,000, while others have placed the guess as high as $5,000,000,000. This estimate was based, I believe, upon a former bill. As I understand it, the bill now before the House increases the final expenditures that must be made in this behalf more than three times. In the meantime it sets up another commission which, under the guise of making homes for veterans, will open the way for land speculation upon a scale which would have rejoiced the heart of Col. Sellers and made J. Rufus Wallingford green with envy. Town building for veterans, along with its inevitable shoals of superintendents and swarms of inspectors, will follow, and any man in Congress who questions the certain waste that must follow will be assailed as a contemptible enemy of the country wholly lacking in patriotism.

Indeed, if the country knew what this section of the bill is going to let the taxpayer in for, there would be a mighty howl from Maine to California. But, as usual, the howl will go up when the damage has been done and is irreparable.

In the meantime, the financing of the plan is placed upon the banks for the next three years. They are now unable, or at least they say they are, to finance the business enterprises of the country. If a billion or two are tied up in these certificates, which can not be rediscounted, the effect will be to still further retard the business revival of the country; and all of this is to be brought about to give these men a sum which can be of very little aid to them in making their way in life. Such a plan will be satisfactory neither to the men nor the country, and what it will eventually cost the people God only knows.

Again I want to ask, where, at the end, are we going to get the money? Within 14 months we must pay or else refund more than six billions of obligations. Others are to follow, and consequently we can not consider bonds. To those who say out of the interest on the foreign debt, I would reply that we have not received any interest on the foreign debt yet, and so inscrutable are the ways of fate and diplomacy that we may never get any. But if we do, it is already pledged by existing law to Liberty bond payments; and if we by legislation now divert that fund to bonus purposes, we must proceed at once to replace it, and there is no way of doing it except by more taxation.

Let us deceive neither ourselves nor the country, that we can allay the wrath of a threatening legion by legislation which at most will enable them to borrow at high interest only one-half what this measure states is coming to them. When we pass this bill it means that the taxpayers are going to have the burden added to those under which they are now staggering. There is no other way to get it. We can not make a pilgrimage to the tomb of either King George or Napoleon, tenderly lay a wreath upon them, and have the treasury doors opened to us. We can not milk it from the blue sky, nor jimmy it out of any foreign country, notwithstanding the success they all once met here.

The people must pay it, and this period of grace is going neither to lighten their burdens nor appease the demands of the service men. What they want is immediate cash, and if we are going to do the thing at all, I share in their feelings. Many of them are out of work, and such plans as have been proposed will help them little, if at all. Indeed, if it is the wise and patriotic thing to do, I am in favor of inspiring ourselves with at least enough courage to come out in the open even before election and perform the act as it should be performed. If it is wise at all, let us pass it with the taxes necessary to raise the money at once and take full responsibility for it. By such a course both the taxpayer and the soldier will know where he stands without waiting until after election. We can not decrease the burden on the public, nor decrease our own responsibility by delays or evasions. And in all candor, I say that if, in view of the fact that it took us 50 years to pay off less than three billions of war debts after 1865, we are now willing to add this three or five billions to the twenty-three we now already owe, it will raise our estimation, both in the eyes of the soldier and the country, to do so now and make an end of it, as we paraphrase the prayer with which the judge consoles other condemned offenders. Let us do it and say: Lord, have mercy upon our political souls.

I am convinced that to pass this bill now or at all is only to still further slow down the wheels of industry, to still further add a burden to the backs of the very people who can least stand it, and therefore to still further decrease the chances of these service men to get a fair and right start in life. That they can ever do so upon this dole we propose to offer is wholly unthinkable to me. If, indeed, we have reached the point where it is necessary to imitate decadent Rome and shower largesses upon our returning victorious soldiers, in my humble judgment it would be far better to use all this money to allot them lands and help such of them as desire it to set themselves up in life at Government expense, not only with 40 acres and a mule but with a complete farm and flivver. However, very few of them want lands. They want cash, and this is why I assert that they will be satisfied with nothing in the plan which will be offered.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to consider the service man's side of this question. My sympathies are all with the youth of this land who in a war not of their making risked all for their country. Such men can not accept what we propose here to give. It is the duty of the citizen to defend his country and in no land where patriotism is really alive can the idea be accepted that he does so for compensation. Therefore any talk of adjusted compensation is little better than insult to him. Yet, sir, we propose as a great patriotic duty to give him $2 a day because plumbers and ditch diggers were getting $8 and $10 while he was defending his country. Their services should never be placed upon a parity with the civilian, however necessary or useful the latter may have been.

The soldier is not a workman engaged for hire, and the moment we begin to try and adjust his wages to equal those of factory workers we take him off the pedestal of the hero and we will forget him as we do forget the innumerable throngs who have not risked their lives for the country. His claims upon the country he has served do not terminate with the close of war. If he has been wounded, the Government seeks to bind up those wounds and to rehabilitate him once more into an active and useful member of society. If those wounds have disabled him, if he lost health or limb, a grateful people are proud to pay whatever is necessary to provide for him and his dependents. They do not regard him as they do the laborer whose claims cease when he is paid for the job, but as a ward of the Nation who has suffered all in its defense and now receives back the care, protection, and honor of the people.

We are already spending $500,000,000 a year to rehabilitate our soldiers, and we are told this must increase until 1927. We do not care if the sum were double or treble that amount, a grateful Nation is glad to pay it. In all probability pension claims in 10 years from now will call for a billion and a half a year. That does not matter, and we shall gladly pay that or any other sum that may be necessary.

I am willing to vote every dollar of the country's resources to bind up the wounds of these soldiers; I am willing to vote every dollar of the country's resources to care for the infirm, the disabled, the aged, and their dependents, so long as one of them shall be left to deserve a grateful country's reverence and aid, but I hesitate to take a step which, if taken, will be regretted by everyone of these men, and his descendants to the third and fourth generation. If these men understood that by pressing such claims they are not only jeopardizing their own fame but are placing a burden upon the country which will disastrously affect every person in it for years to come, they would be the last to want to take such a step.

They do not want to increase unemployment, to make heavier the already heavy burden of living, for a pittance which can only slightly alleviate their own condition. Such a course may appeal to the politician, covetous of place and power, but the noble birthright of the American soldier, who served his country through a sense of duty, and not for money, should be sold for no such paltry mess of pottage. He served because duty called. All he hoped to get was honor, and that honor should be preserved uncompromised to him and his descendants forever. I hesitate to drag him by legislation from the proud pedestal he now occupies into the labor market, there to adjust his compensation upon the basis of some gas fitter or ditch digger. He did not enter this war for pay. All he could hope to get out of it was the imperishable glory that he offered his life for his country, and to talk now of adjusting his compensation is to tinge the whole heroic fabric with a touch of the sordid and ridiculous. We may make strong denials to the contrary, but words can not change the facts of life, and it is utterly impossible to take this proposed action without smearing the whole glorious story with a black streak of commercialism.

It is urged in behalf of this measure that a man can not live on glorious memories. That is true. But let us suppose that a soldier were presented with a sword as a grateful testimonial for some splendid act of gallantry, and that after listening to the speeches he should say, "I can not live on a sword and if it suits you gentlemen just as well, take it back and give me a ham that I can eat." That too, would be true. And yet such a course would be followed by consequences so disastrous that no man would risk it. And yet what we propose here differs in degree and not in kind at all. These men that are now pleading for the passage of this bill do not understand its inevitable consequences. I am unwilling to be a party to this act which writes upon the pages of our history such a story, for I am convinced that it would be even more unfortunate for these men than it would be for the country.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to call attention to just one more phase of this subject, and one which I believe has been generally overlooked. Our Government was founded upon theories which were utterly repugnant to the recognition of any class that should receive special favors at the hands of the public. I know, sir, that this idea has long since ceased to attract the interested attention of the American public. On the contrary, we have long since cast to the winds even the spirit, if not the letter, of some parts of the Constitution designed to prevent that great calamity in the experiment of government. Indeed, we have ceased to translate great and fundamental principles into laws of general application which are designed for the promotion of the general welfare of the whole people. Instead we are constantly busying ourselves in experimental legislation utterly at variance with the teachings of our founding fathers and of doubtful value to anyone except, perhaps, the small groups and classes that promote it. There is no portent upon the overcast skies of our country that is more ominous.

Once any Government commits itself to the fatal policy of singling out preferred classes for special benefits it is lost.

The testimony of all history is eloquent of this fact, and we can not escape the fate of the countless dead nations that strew thick the highways of the past because they disregarded this fundamental principle. I doubt, sir, if we are going to heed the warning. Those who would hold steadfastly to the principles of the fathers are growing fewer in numbers as the years go by. On the contrary, every breeze is vocal of the weird clamor of the ever-increasing throngs who are teaching that it is the function of government to make men happy and prosperous here, if, indeed, not to give them a harp and crown across the Great Divide. Those of us who oppose these strange doctrines as unsound must oppose this bonus bill upon that ground also, for, indeed, it is the cap sheaf upon the whole stack of class legislation.

I am aware, sir, that our efforts will be futile. We shall not only fail in our opposition but we will be misunderstood, and so far has it become possible for a class to organize and dominate Congress that there will be few votes cast against this measure.

Indeed it is exceedingly doubtful if the man who opposes this bill had not better now say farewell to his political ambitions. The public is largely indifferent to any principles except those that return quick and personal results, and under such conditions it is not difficult for a small and vociferous minority to completely control government. The success of its predecessors emboldens each subsequent effort, and if we may believe the press reports we have now reached the point where amidst the applause of the unthinking multitude the head of the American Legion uses language to the President of the United States which might have been expected from a captain of Prætorian Guard to a weak and pusillanimous emperor of decadent Rome, but hardly to the Chief Executive of this great Republic. Presumption of class rights could scarcely go further.

Many of us who in private life have been opposing this fatal drift to class government and State socialism no longer feel that the public can be awakened and rallied to the defense of constitutional government as it was handed down to us by our fathers.

In my humble judgment the die is cast, and coming generations will return no more to the ways of the fathers. I would not be so presumptuous as to assert that the new road may not lead to a more splendid destination than ever could have been reached by the old one. But I can not in conscience follow it and I trust that my colleagues may pardon me if this, which perhaps is my last speech in the House, is directed against so popular a measure as the soldiers' bonus, which, nevertheless, I believe to be wholly and indefensibly wrong, for which reason I shall vote against it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 18 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BEGG). The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 18 minutes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, inasmuch as Congress has to be a sort of city council for Washington and the District of Columbia, it seems to me that something ought to be said on the floor of this House in honest commendation of the investigations that have proceeded thus far concerning the Knickerbocker Theater disaster, which was not only an unspeakable horror to Washington but a shocking national sorrow. Before the investigations of the coroner's jury and the grand jury began it was heard on every side that since such investigations are sometimes neither fearless nor faithful there might be some disposition not to do the square thing; but it has been a source of genuine gratification to every friend of humanity and of community righteousness that thus far there has been no evidence of a disposition to whitewash that investigation.

Not because this great tragedy touched my own home—although it is natural that my own interest has been accentuated by this fact—but because of the interest which all of us share in the sorrow which has come like a crushing avalanche upon thousands of others, I went to inspect the ruins and to try to discover the cause. I was accompanied by a promiment Washington physician, Dr. J. T. Wolfe, who was a student of engineering for several years before he became an expert physician and surgeon, and although only a layman myself concerning such construction, I saw at once through his interpretation that somebody connected with the building of the Knickerbocker Theater had been guilty of a selfish, careless neglect that was nothing short of criminal. Convinced that Congress owed a duty in this matter to the District, which it proposes to govern, I went to Senator CAPPER, who had introduced a ringing resolution calling for a senatorial investigation, and asked him to meet me at the ruins with several members of the Senate District Committee in order that personal investigation on their part might verify my conviction. Wednesday morning after the tragedy I met there Senators CAPPER, SHEPPARD, GOODING, JONES, and WELLER and two or three practical engineers, including Dr. Wolfe, helping in the investigation, and I am sure that every member of the committee was convinced, as I am, that the disaster is traceable directly to faulty construction and criminally careless inspection. I do not wish to be bitter toward any man. My heart is too full of that spiritual enrichment which always comes from personal sorrow and from "feeling another's woe" to permit me to indulge in bitter invective or groundless criticism. But as a Member of this Congress, to say nothing of my obligation as a citizen, I owe it to suffering humanity now, and to thousands more who may suffer if congressional lawmakers should hold their peace, to express my desperate conviction on this subject and to back up these investigations with every ounce and atom of my energy and influence. I believe that the Senate committee will leave no stone unturned until criminal and civil responsibility is established.

BARE WALLS SPEAK THEIR SILENT CONDEMNATION.

Somebody is grossly guilty. The bare walls that stand comparatively intact around that scene of horror witness with gaunt and silent condemnation against the builders of that theater. Their very existence after such a horrible crash spells condemnation in letters that blaze on the Washington sky. Anybody does not have to be a building engineer or an expert contractor or architect to know that the roof which fell was not properly fastened to the walls, or they would not now be standing so nearly perfect in appearance from the outside that a stranger passing along Columbia Road or Eighteenth Street would never suspect the indescribable tragedy that occurred but yesterday within those guilty walls. Think of it, if you can with equanimity! The girders supporting that roof rested on lintels set in hollow tiling and were not even keyed to their support. It is not enough to answer that those lintels had steel pillars for support—the girder slipped off the lintel on the Columbia Road wall when the roof sagged, for the main girder had only a 4-inch bearing. As an experienced builder who is a Member of this Congress said to me: "Human life was sacrificed in order to cheapen the cost of that roof." God save the tragic picture—money against humanity!

As an evidence of the fact that it was not merely the snow that made the roof fall, we see standing many other theaters that did not fall that night. It is positively inescapable that this Government has been paying inspectors salaries so unthinkable in their smallness that they were absolutely unable to command thoroughly capable men. One man who passed on those building plans—think of it—was a former bricklayer with no real, scientific experience in building. Another had been a mechanic in the navy yard, with the same lack of experience, while the man under whose eye the building in course of construction is supposed to have passed was a decrepid old man of 80 years who is now dead.

Securing their positions through political influence and holding them through governmental complicity and criminal neglect, they constitute the type of men before whom real architects, real engineers—graduates of such great schools as Boston "Tech," Georgia "Tech," and other famous engineering institutions—must lay their building plans and from whom these expert builders must secure permission to erect houses in the District. Is it little wonder that such inadequate and inefficient "officials" accepted plans for the Knickerbocker Theater drawn by an architect who furnished the plans of another playhouse in Washington that fell before it was finished?

Twenty-six inches of snow, weighing about the same as 2 inches of water, did not make enough weight to break any properly constructed roof. A roof that will not stand under 2 inches of water is a domestic and a community outrage. There was simply no stable connection between the roof and the wall. If there had been, the walls of the Knickerbocker would at least have been partly shattered when the roof went down with weight enough to destroy and maim the lives and bodies of hundreds. The main point is that the roof would not have fallen if the main girders had had sufficient bearing on the lintels. One contractor said, as he looked at the unprotected mortises from which those giant girders had slipped with such ease when the roof sagged, carrying such wholesale production of desolation and death: "I wouldn't build a roof like that for a house for my dog if I cared anything for the dog's life."

DO NOT BLAME THIS SIN ON GOD.

Again I declare that I do not wish to be personally bitter. But we must be just enough to startle and protect the living, although our arms are too short to rescue the maimed and the suffering or bring back the dead. I speak with reverence now, but I must resent the apologetic declaration of one prominent man who piously exclaimed that "Nobody should be blamed—it was the act of God!" That remark was doubtless reverent in spirit, but it is impious in doctrine. I deny the imputation against the God I worship and try to serve. God made the snow fall—the beautiful snow—in obedience to His beneficent law, but God never taught any contractor to use faulty material in the construction of a house; and God never taught any careless builder to construct a roof with such palpable lack of protection that it would suddenly fall and cause so much suffering and death. God can overrule for our spiritual good any great sorrow through which He permits us to pass, but He must not be charged with the improvident, selfish sin of any man or set of men who would save money at the expense of suffering humanity. It was the human devil of religious intolerance that lighted up the Dark Ages with the martyr fires of the saints, but the Son of God, who walked in the furnace of persecution with the Hebrew children, carried those martyrs of faith to Heaven on the wreathing bosom of flame. Let me speak in personal frankness to my honored colleagues. Well-meaning friends actually say to me, "I think it was a good thing that God made you fall on that wagon and hurt your spine when you were a boy, for I think you have done lots more good in the world than you would have done if you had never been crippled."

Permit me to say that I honor the spirit and intention of such a remark, but I gravely and joyously question its theology. I really think that the Lord did not have anything to do with making me fall on that wagon. I think I was standing carelessly as well as awkwardly, or I would not have fallen. But I do reverently rejoice to believe that when that ambitious farmer boy fell on that wagon when he was hauling wood the Master to whom he had already trusted his soul caught his body in His everlasting arms and has held him ever since. He knew how to stand by the bedside of that disappointed boy, lying amid the wreckage of his shattered hopes and dreams, and make the valley of trial a mountain height of joy, even as the Christ of Calvary, the Prince of Peace, came to those trusting souls amid the wreckage and the débris and the impending death at the Knickerbocker playhouse and helped them to make the darkness and the suffering vocal and radiant with the songs of triumphant faith and the light that broke through that hideous darkness from over the everlasting hills. He can kiss the somber face of any sorrow into an angel of light and blessing.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, since that trying experience, enriched by personal sorrow and the sorrow that is always lightened and sweetened when it goes into the valley of the shadow with others, I am in no humor to be bitter, and I am in no humor to meet an infidel. I have seen "religion on the job." I am thinking of what I have seen of the marvelous wealth of human kindness and Christian sympathy and fellowship. Everything that humanity and Christianity could suggest has been done for those who have suffered. I am thinking of a great wonderful city in Georgia, hanging for eight terrible days over the bedside of one suffering girl. I am thinking of the brave little town of Douglasville, which holds her sacred ashes, the town where she was born 16 years ago, where she gave her young heart to Christ and to the clinging hundreds who loved her—the noble town that broke its heart in prayers and tears during those anxious days of tension and suffering; I am thinking of the wilderness of flowers whose beauty and fragrance spoke at once the mingled, measureless love of the friends in Washington and the friends in Georgia whom God had given in such wondrous and sustaining plentitude—flowers which overflowed her own untimely resting place and covered, as her unselfish loving heart would have had them do, the new-made grave of her noble Christian father, my brother, Lucius C. Upshaw, who had been my companion secretary, my mental flint, my spiritual mentor, my daily inspiration.

All the heart's wild longings ended,
All life's wearying struggles past,
And the suffering body resting
'Neath the sweet spring flowers at last.

Ah, my colleagues, you who have been so thoughtful in your beautiful expression of sympathy and friendship, it is only natural for those of us who are humanly human to be selfish in our sorrow, but we must not be. We must multiply the staggering sorrow of our stricken home by a kindred sorrow in more than 200 homes, where broken bodies or broken hearts are the tragic toll of man's selfish, blundering sin.

Let us, therefore, as individuals and lawmakers, wisely and fearlessly place the blame of this great tragedy on sinful man and not on a sinless God, and move with resolute wisdom to protect thousands, perhaps yet unborn, from such a tragedy as that under whose unspeakable shadow the Nation weeps to-day.

STARS IN THE NIGHT.

Determined on this course for the sake of the righteous protection of others, as well as the vindication of the good name of the National Capital, whose residents have a right to expect of the Government the vigilant guardianship of their lives in places of public assembly, we turn our faces from the appalling scene and look for "stars in the night"—the night that baffles human philosophy and issues a sharp and startling challenge to the faith that holds; an anchor in the storm; the faith that clings and sings in the darkness where comprehension stops; the faith that triumphs, thank God, over the very "gates of hell." We see the first gleam from the Star of Bethlehem in "the still, small voice" of Him who said, "I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you"; we see another gleam not only in the Holy Presence that alleviates personal suffering, but that enables the children of faith to so forget self that they actually sing their songs of comfort to others until the message to wounded and dying comrades is stilled in the tide of death; we see another gleam—aye, more than a gleam—a sunburst of radiance from the cross that "towers over the wrecks of time" in the swift-footed kindness, the tender tear, the tireless touch, the sleepless vigil, on the part of princes in Israel and handmaidens of God who rushed to bear another's burden and "so fulfill the law of Christ." From every side these beautiful, wonderful manifestations have come all the way from the White House to the humblest home yonder in my district—from friends and strangers in this great Capital City and from far across the continent—and we thank God at a time like this for stars that shine in the night, for the voice of Him who spoke to the storm-tossed sea even as He speaks now to the raging Galilee of our sorrows, saying, "Peace, be still."

Verily, in such an hour of human desolation there is nothing left to the skeptic but a starless night and the "new-made graves of faith and hope"; but those who rejoice in a personal acquaintance with the Redeemer of Men in the miracle of regeneration can see the rainbow promise of God shining on every cloud as they exclaim in radiant triumph:

E'en sorrow touched by Thee grows bright
With more than rapture's ray,
As darkness shows us worlds of light
We never saw by day.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia yields back four minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is recognized for 13 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Outside these walls it is not commonly understood that general debate on the appropriation bills furnishes to Members of the House the only opportunity to discuss the broader questions of public policy. I had thought it might not be inappropriate in connection with the bill under consideration to discuss the two parts of the report of the committee on the agricultural crisis that are already in our hands. It happens, however, that the circumstances of debate have brought the attendance to almost an irreducible minimum. I am not vain enough to think that the importance of my remarks would be such as to warrant my taking half an hour of time out of the people's Treasury, as an English statesman has called it, to secure the presence of a quorum. Furthermore, although I might ask for opportunity to revise and extend my remarks, it seems to me that this privilege should not be used except under extraordinary circumstances, and I have no desire, unless under such circumstances, to give my constituents the impression that I have said things which in fact have not been spoken on the floor. This brings me to the apparent desirability of refraining from delivering the eloquent, cogent, forceful, powerful speech which otherwise would have fallen upon your ears. Its gems of learning and eloquence, therefore, will never delight mankind.

I may say, however, that I had intended to pay as warm a compliment as I could to the chairman of the Commission of Agricultural Inquiry [Mr. ANDERSON] and his fellow members for their most remarkable report. At any rate, I may call the attention of Members to the fact that the two parts already printed contain ammunition that will be used in the political campaigns of the next 10 or 20 years, and to urge every fellow Member who desires to equip himself for the controversies before us to read these parts with diligence and sympathy.

I had not desired to take issue with much, if any, of what the commission concludes, but to emphasize some things in its report which seem to me worthy of especial attention. In that connection I had wanted to cite an English legislator, Edwin Chadwick, who, after serving on more than 20 commissions, made the astonishing declaration that he never knew an investigation "which did not reverse every main principle and almost every assumed elementary fact on which the general public, parliamentary committees, politicians of high standing, and often the commissioners themselves were prepared to base legislation." I think I could have pointed out, had the opportunity been presented in this instance, how a commission containing several members of the agricultural bloc, among them the gentleman recently elected chairman of that organization, had come to almost unanimous agreement—unanimous, indeed, except in one particular—as to positions directly the reverse of those that some of them had taken in previous discussion of the subject. Not only for the academic purpose of enforcing economic truth, but also for the sake of securing accurate political discussion based upon correct premises, I wanted to call attention to these facts. But under the circumstances, sir, I shall throw away the speech and use but a moment or two of the time remaining to me to comment upon one feature of debate in this body which may be pertinently brought to attention in view of the rumor that the so-called bonus bill will not be given adequate consideration in this House.

It is one of the misfortunes of large legislative bodies that they often show a lack of sense of proportion, dwelling at much length on minor matters, and refraining from giving adequate treatment to those of genuine and great consequence. I should like, in view of some of the debate we have been having to-day, to put on record my own approval of the Republican leader of the House in his course in the matter of appearing before the committees to urge economy. Indeed, I should like to record my own approval of the leadership of the House in general despite the criticism widespread throughout the country now aimed thereat. For one I believe that this criticism is in large measure undeserved. I think the Republican leadership of the House could as a whole be justified. Yet it is fair to point out that this criticism exists, and I would like to deplore the possibility of adding greatly to it by any course of action which shall deprive this body of an opportunity for full and free debate on one of the greatest questions it will have to consider.

It would fly in the face of the very purpose of parliamentary institutions, the very theory on which Congress meets, if the program should prevail of restricting to 40 minutes the opportunity to discuss the bonus bill. Therefore, not alone for the welfare of my party but also for the reputation of the House, for the safeguarding of parliamentary institutions and the preservation of orderly government, I beg that there may not be carried out the rumored plan, but that the Representatives of the people may know all the facts of the case, may listen to all the arguments in the case, may reach conclusion after that mature deliberation which alone justifies our presence in this Chamber.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is there any reason in the world why more time can not be given to that matter and less time to such desultory matters as we are having now when speeches on general subjects are being made? Could not we give more time to that and less to these others.

Mr. LUCE. Personally I wish that could be the case. I have not been without experience in legislative bodies and I have observed that it is their universal habit to reverse the telescope, giving a great deal of time to insignificant measures and not permitting adequate discussion of those of real importance. I criticize therein not the leadership but the nature of parliamentary bodies in general, for they have shown themselves from time immemorial to be without a sense of due proportion.

I hope in this particular instance that the Republican leadership may see the wisdom, the political wisdom, and more than that the ethical wisdom, the patriotic wisdom, of giving all arguments an opportunity to be heard. Down through the ages has come the cry of Themistocles to Eurybiades, "Strike, but hear me." Though I may be but a minority of one when the vote comes, I beg you to listen to that plea, "Strike, but hear me." If that be then granted, it will wipe out any regret that on this occasion you have by mischance been deprived of edification.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

For salaries and compensation of necessary employees in the mechanical shops and power plant of the Department of Agriculture, $90,000: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, by transfer settlement through the general accounting office, reimburse any appropriation made for the salaries and compensation of employees in the mechanical shops of the department from the appropriation made for the bureau, office, or division for which any work in said shops is performed, and such reimbursement shall be at the actual cost of labor for such work.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. You first appropriate $90,000 for the mechanical shops and power plant and then you propose to give authority to other branches of the service to have the work done there to be paid for by that branch. How much work is done and what is the necessity of having an appropriation for the shops if they have work to be reimbursed?

Mr. ANDERSON. This includes besides the mechanical shops the power plant, and also a considerable amount of mechanical work done under the Secretary's office not chargeable to the various bureaus. I understand the total amount of reimbursement would be in the neighborhood of $25,000.

Mr. MANN. There is a 10 per cent decrease in the appropriation, and I only desired to know whether a large share of the expenditure was not made where it would be reimbursed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not. The maximum amount, I think, would be about $20,000, and a part of that is being now reimbursed in any event because they do pay for the material used. This would only carry an addition to the cost of labor in making the mechanical appliances.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

For stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, and mattings; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, telephoning, postage, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings and heating apparatus; for the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles for official purposes only; for the payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the expense of the dispatch agent in New York; for official traveling expenses; and for other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the department, $161,000, of which not to exceed $5,000 shall be immediately available for the purchase of an automobile for the official use of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if this automobile is for the use of the Secretary?

Mr. ANDERSON. The automobile is for the use of the Secretary, and it is expected that the horses and carriages that the Secretary now uses will be disposed of or sent to the farm.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to construct in the grounds of the Department of Agriculture, in the District of Columbia and at a point to be selected by him, a vault at a cost of not exceeding $2,500, for the safe storage outside of laboratories and buildings of supplies of highly inflammable materials, the cost of such vault to be prorated and paid from the appropriations provided for the bureaus occupying space therein.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order in order to get some information. Where is it proposed to locate this vault?

Mr. ANDERSON. Somewhere in the department grounds, near the buildings, I could not tell the gentleman exactly.

Mr. MANN. I do not imagine they would locate it improperly. Still, considering the criminal mistake they made about the erection of the Agricultural Department buildings themselves—and it was a crime that was committed at that time—when they were put up, I do not have the utmost confidence in the impossibility of their making a mistake now. The agricultural grounds now are quite extensive. I have no objection to the erection of a vault, but I do not want to see them do any injury to the grounds.

Mr. ANDERSON. This vault is to be entirely below the surface of the ground.

Mr. HAUGEN. These materials are now stored in the buildings.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; the materials are now stored in the buildings.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that, regardless of the question of danger, there is demand for all the room they have in the Agricultural Department buildings. This is a sort of hall of records for material.

Mr. HAUGEN. It would have to be placed where it is accessible.

Mr. MANN. Certainly, but I inquire simply to know if the location has been selected. We have been imposed upon so often in the construction of statues and buildings in the city of Washington that if we can get the information I would like to have it now, although I am not going to stand on that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not tell the gentleman exactly where it is to be located. I do not know. In fact, I do not think the Secretary has selected a particular place. They did not tell us that he had.

Mr. WALSH. What inflammable materials does this department have that would require the erection of a vault?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is a good deal of chemical material used in the chemical experiments in the plant and animal industry bureaus, and I take it that possibly some of the films which are very inflammable might be stored there. It would be only such as would be practically out of use.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

RENT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia, for use of the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture, $165,666: Provided, That only such part of this sum shall be available to pay rent for space which can not be furnished by the Public Buildings Commission in Government buildings located in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is a very considerable sum to be paid for rent in the District of Columbia. The buildings of the Agriculture Department are somewhat extensive. Is there any hope of a reduction in this rental bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. As the gentleman knows, we have a joint congressional committee which parcels out the emergency buildings, and I think has general charge of the rental situation. The department says that they have made application to the Public Buildings Commission for space in available buildings, but they have not been able to get enough. They are consequently forced to continue what they have been doing, namely, to rent such buildings as they require. As a matter of fact, I think the department is now housed in 40 different buildings.

Mr. TILSON. The amount in the report is $1,000 more than the appropriation last year, and at the same time it is $16,200 less than the estimates for this fiscal year. It seems the demands are still coming for more rent.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is due in part to a readjustment of buildings—that is, the discontinuance of one building and the rental of other buildings—and it is partly due to the fact that in the Forestry Building, on F Street, they have to pay this year $12,000 more rent for it than they paid last year.

Mr. TILSON. So that, as a matter of fact, you are not enlarging the amount of the quarters, but you have to pay a lot more for them?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is true.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock, and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to buildings thereon; the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases, and the mallein testing of animals, $529,640: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 shall be used for improvements and repairs to quarantine stations: Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be used for the manufacture, preparation, or distribution of blackleg vaccine.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this proviso. Why the necessity for a proviso that no part of this sum shall be used for the manufacture, preparation, or distribution of blackleg vaccine?

Mr. ANDERSON. As the gentleman knows, the department has been distributing an inferior article of vaccine, which does not give complete immunity. Vaccine is made by private concerns which does, and we thought there was no use of spending $5,000 for the distribution of vaccine which really is not a satisfactory article.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is the department satisfied to discontinue it?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. And it is supplied by private concerns?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. And can be purchased at a proper price?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Are we to understand from the gentleman's statement that the department admits that they have less knowledge on this subject than have the private manufacturers?

Mr. ANDERSON. No. This is the situation: We either had to give them more money so that they could make a better product or else cut it out altogether, and we did not see any reason why the Government should be in the business of distributing vaccine when a commercial article at a reasonable price can be had, so we cut it out altogether instead of giving them more money to manufacture. The reason they have manufactured an inferior article is because they have not had money enough to manufacture a better article.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. And in the hearings did the committee go into the matter sufficiently to convince themselves that the private manufacturers are manufacturing and sending out a vaccine that has been thoroughly demonstrated to be effectual in preventing blackleg?

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand that is what the representatives of the department say.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Of course, the private manufacturers will claim they are. There is grave doubt in the minds of cattlemen all over the country, so far as my own observation and investigation go, as to whether any of these preventives are effectual.

Mr. ANDERSON. In any event, the department admits that the vaccine now being manufactured by the private parties is a better article than the article that they have been manufacturing.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Well, I fully agree with the gentleman. If they have vaccine which is utterly inefficient, not effective, they should not send it out, because the stockmen throughout the country are sending constantly, very frequently, to the department to be supplied with this vaccine. I am surprised and yet interested very much in the gentleman's statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, for the tuberculin testing of animals, and for researches concerning the cause of the disease, its modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and such other means as may be necessary, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State, Territory, or county authorities, $2,578,800, of which $850,000 shall be set aside for administrative and operating expenses and $1,728,800 for the payment of indemnities: Provided, however, That in carrying out the purpose of this appropriation, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture it shall be necessary to destroy tuberculous animals and to compensate owners for loss thereof, he may, in his discretion, and in accordance with such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, expend in the city of Washington or elsewhere, out of the moneys of this appropriation, such sums as he shall determine to be necessary, within the limitations above provided, for the reimbursement of owners of animals so destroyed, in cooperation with such States, Territories, counties, or municipalities, as shall by law or by suitable action in keeping with its authority in the matter, and by rules and regulations adopted and enforced in pursuance thereof, provide inspection of tuberculous animals and for compensation to owners of animals so destroyed, but no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be used in compensating owners of such animals except in cooperation with and supplementary to payments to be made by State, Territory, county, or municipality where condemnation of such animals shall take place; nor shall any payment be made hereunder as compensation for or on account of any such animal destroyed if at the time of inspection or test of such animal, or at the time of condemnation thereof, it shall belong to or be upon the premises of any person, firm, or corporation, to which it has been sold, shipped, or delivered for the purpose of being slaughtered: Provided further, That out of the money hereby appropriated no payment as compensation for any tuberculous animal destroyed shall exceed one-third of the difference between the appraised value of such animal and the value of the salvage thereof; that no payment hereunder shall exceed the amount paid or to be paid by the State, Territory, county, or municipality where the animal shall be condemned; and that in no case shall any payment hereunder be more than $25 for any grade animal or more than $50 for any pure-bred animal, and no payment shall be made unless the owner has complied with all lawful quarantine regulations.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very much interested in this appropriation and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to it. How many claims are there on file now from the various States for animals that have been tested which should be paid?

Mr. ANDERSON. Claims for indemnity?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not tell the gentleman; but there should not be any.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman understands they have paid up to the present time for those that have been examined and condemned?

Mr. ANDERSON. My understanding is that as soon as they reach the limit of the appropriation for indemnity they stop work.

Mr. SNELL. They stop work. How many applications are there on file for examinations? Was that brought out in the hearing?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I think there are 27,180 herds on the waiting list to be tested, and they comprise about 362,139 cattle.

Mr. SNELL. How long has it been since they stopped making examinations?

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand they have not stopped, because the last deficiency bill carried a deficiency appropriation of $600,000, which enabled them to continue.

Mr. SNELL. I note the appropriation is increased $125,000 over last year.

Mr. ANDERSON. More than that.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amount appropriated is $1,728,000——

Mr. SNELL. Will that be enough to carry on the work fairly consistently throughout the whole country?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think, with the division we have made, it will.

Mr. SNELL. They are having tests made throughout the year to take care of actual emergency cases over the country.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so. There was a supplemental estimate made just a few days before this bill was reported requesting $900,000. We gave them $600,000, and that makes the appropriation for the next fiscal year exactly the same amount as for this fiscal year, including the deficiency appropriation of $600,000.

Mr. SNELL. Then they do not get any more than this fiscal year?

Mr. ANDERSON. No. They have an original appropriation which was approximately $2,000,000 and a deficiency of $600,000, and we give the same amount, including the deficiency.

Mr. SNELL. But they did not have enough to carry them through last year.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. But I understood that they stopped the examination and testing for some time?

Mr. ANDERSON. Because they had exhausted the amount carried in the original bill.

Mr. SNELL. And with the deficiency that will be enough to carry them next year?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is all they asked for.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The gentleman understands that this bill provides enough continuity of appropriations to carry on this work?

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe so.

Mr. MANN. In view of the interest manifested by the two gentlemen from New York, is this one of the grafts which go to the State of New York?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. We are spending about a million dollars next year.

Mr. MANN. That being so, why any appropriation?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. New York appropriates one-third of every dollar asked of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I understand New York Members never favor anything that will put any money into New York in connection with State appropriation and——

Mr. SNELL. No; what we fought against was where the other fellow was not cooperating.

Mr. MANN (continuing). But when it comes home they all weaken.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is this appropriation divided among the States?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is allotted according to the State appropriation in part, and in part by the number of cattle to be tested.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. If some particular State does not use its share of the appropriation, can it be used by a State prosecuting this work?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; if reallotted by the Secretary.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is not so in regard to the last appropriation?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it has always been so.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. No; the Secretary of Agriculture told our delegation that while there was a large unexpended appropriation he could not use it.

Mr. ANDERSON. But that unexpended appropriation has been allotted to these other States, and it was expended, in all probability, by those States.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. If there was an unexpended appropriation, what becomes of it?

Mr. ANDERSON. It goes back into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. But it can be reallotted to the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The last two words are "quarantine regulations," and if the Fordney tariff bill has been quarantined since the 21st of July, 1921, it is high time the embargo was lifted. [Applause.] Let me say to the Members of the House and the country that yesterday there came to us a ray of sunlight out of the darkness and the gloom that encompassed the Members of this House and the people of the United States. And once more we are to rejoice that the hum of the spindle and the song of the loom are again to be music to the ears of the men and the women who make us a great industrial Nation. You may think that this statement is rather enigmatical at this time, but I will advise you that, on page 3564 of the RECORD, in the proceedings, not of this body, but in the Chamber occupied by the august body at the other end of the Capitol, there appears during a colloquy on the floor, on page 3564, a statement to which I will call your attention in a moment. I know the House rule as to mentioning a Senator's name, or criticizing the Senate, which we have to obey, but to which they pay no attention, and frequently call the Members of the House by name and attack them during discussion and debate. But I am not going to criticize them. I desire to extend full measure of appreciation for the statement to which I referred a moment ago. A distinguished gentleman stated, on page 3564, that it was his desire to get these treaties out of the way, for this reason:

In order to clear the path—

Mind you, the path is at last to be cleared—clear the path for the bill of the Senator from Iowa, the appropriation bill, and the tariff bill.

The path is at last to be cleared for the tariff bill, and I call attention to the fact that that is the first time in this session I have heard of its being mentioned on the floor of the august body at the other end of the Capitol—not that its being reported makes any great difference, because it would take an Einstein to figure out the relativity as to the date of its being reported and the final passage of the bill.

But I am glad to call your attention to the fact that the tariff was mentioned yesterday, merely mentioned, of course, in that august tribunal at the other end of the Capitol, and we realize it is a crumb of comfort, it is a ray of hope, that may help to revive our stricken industries. It is a good message to send out to all the people of the country, the working folks, and the men who employ them, who are straining every nerve to keep their mills open in the face of the severest foreign competition they have ever known. So, whether it be threat, promise, or declaration, we realize that at last the path is to be cleared for the tariff bill. I congratulate the gentleman for mentioning it in that way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Who was the gentleman that is reported as making this statement?

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman knows the rules of the House forbid——

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CROWTHER. Frequently these rules are violated, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who interrupts, has frequently mentioned the Senate and quoted them——

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have never done it in an unparliamentary way in 25 years of service.

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not know that he did it in an unparliamentary way, but he made suggestions, and referred to the body at the other end of the Capitol, and their peculiar idiosyncrasies, delays, and so forth, in his own original and inimitable way. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $284,320: Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $58,640 may be used for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding: Provided further, That of the sum thus appropriated $8,000 is hereby made immediately available for the erection of necessary buildings at the United States sheep experiment station in Clark County, Idaho, to furnish facilities for the investigation of problems pertaining to the sheep and wool industry on the farms and ranges of the Western States.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to inquire about this item of $8,000 to be made immediately available for the erection of the necessary buildings for the United States sheep experiment station in Clark County, Idaho.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman will remember that the estimates last year carried an ambitious program for buildings on this experimental farm, carrying altogether something over $16,000. We carried $8,000 last year and we carry $8,000 each year.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is the purpose of it? Is it to build barns, or what?

Mr. ANDERSON. It includes a storage reservoir at $3,000. As the gentleman knows, this plant is a long distance from town, and this storage reservoir is for the purpose of watering the stock and also for affording some fire protection to the buildings. Three thousand five hundred dollars is for fencing, and $1,500 covers an addition to the superintendent's residence, making $8,000 in all.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is the cost of the residence now?

Mr. ANDERSON. The residence, as I recall, originally cost something like $2,500.

Mr. HAUGEN. Was it not the understanding last year that the amount appropriated then would complete the project?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not. My understanding is that we covered half of it last year and that we would continue the program this year.

Mr. HAUGEN. Have you a statement there as to what the money is to be used for?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is it for?

Mr. ANDERSON. Three thousand dollars for a storage reservoir, $3,500 for fencing, and $1,500 for addition to the superintendent's residence.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is what the $8,000 is appropriated for?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. What about the storage reservoir? What do they store in the reservoir?

Mr. ANDERSON. Water.

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 14, line 22, strike out "$58,640" and insert "$62,860."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to increase the amount of this appropriation to the sum recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. Under the new Budget system I believe that Congress should pay some attention to recommendations made by that bureau which, after careful study, have been submitted to Congress. I am particularly interested in this item, because the sum of money here appropriated is intended for two poultry experiment stations, one at Beltsville, Md., and the other at Glendale, in the State of Arizona.

The work at the Glendale station is developing very satisfactorily, since the first poultry stock and equipment were only installed there on November 1, 1921. A foreman's cottage has been completed and an incubator cellar and feed house are well along in the process of construction. There are now over 300 head of poultry breeding stock on this farm and the plans for the coming year are to increase the houses, equipment, and stock very materially.

I am informed that the main lines of investigational work will be the feeding and breeding of poultry to develop lines of fowls which will do well in Arizona, and a study of methods of feeding peculiarly adapted to the Southwest. The chickens at this plant have been developed from the department's experiment station at Beltsville, Md., and the birds which have been carried in the Glendale station for one year have made splendid egg records.

In connection with the investigational work along breeding lines, I am told that artificial incubation will be used and methods studied which are found best adapted for climatic conditions there. Present plans are not only to increase the work with chickens very materially but at a later date to add work with turkeys, which have big possibilities in the Southwest, and later to develop work with ducks and geese.

Great interest is being shown in the poultry work and already a large number of visitors have been at the Glendale Experiment Station. The effect of good breeding stock and a poultryman well qualified in the poultry work adapted to that section is very marked in the improvement of the poultry in the Southwest and is creating greater interest in the raising and management of a much better grade of poultry.

There is an unsolved problem in poultry incubation for which the increase set forth in my amendment is asked. For some reason unknown, but nevertheless true, between the seventeenth and nineteenth day of incubation the largest number of chicks die in the shell. This loss is responsible for probably 25 per cent of the deaths of chicks in eggs that do not hatch. This is a fact, but no one knows why it is a fact, and the department wants to make a study which will explain this puzzle. The results of such investigations may be of immense benefit to the poultry industry all over the United States. The Bureau of Animal Industry was able to convince the Director General of the Budget that this sum should be allowed, and I would like to hear from some member of the Committee on Appropriations as to why it should not be authorized at this time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman does not propose to increase the appropriation, as I understand it, but to take away the money from some other service to give it to this service.

Mr. HAYDEN. If that is the case, why does the Committee on Appropriations in its report claim credit for a saving of $4,220 in this item?

Mr. MANN. Was the gentleman's amendment to increase the amount in line 21?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; but that can easily be done if a majority of the committee will follow my advice.

Mr. MANN. I know that. But that was not the amendment. The gentleman's amendment was to increase the appropriation for poultry feeding and take it away from somebody else.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will now aid me in securing the adoption of this amendment I shall very quickly offer a subsequent amendment to increase the total. On this test vote I hope that I shall have the assistance of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who is not only an expert in gardening but I am sure is also deeply interested in poultry raising.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, of course it is interesting to know why there is a loss of chicks on the seventeenth day or eighteenth day of incubation. There are yet many things to find out. But the general theory of this bill was that we should not include new projects except those of an emergency character, and upon that general theory this new item of appropriation was eliminated. I hope that the item will not be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all necessary expenses for the investigation, treatment, and eradication of dourine, $45,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, line 6, strike out "$45,000" and insert "$50,000."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am merely seeking to have restored to the bill the full amount recommended by the Budget Bureau for the eradication of dourine. Congress has been appropriating considerable sums of money for the eradication of this disease of horses, beginning in 1919 with $97,000; in 1920, $88,000; 1921, $65,000; and $50,000 for the current year. I gather from the hearings that great success has attended this work, and if it is properly prosecuted the disease can be completely eradicated in the entire United States in the immediate future. The testimony as given before the Committee on Appropriations is that this disease is making its last stand in the Southwest, principally in the Navajo Indian country. The Indian appropriation bill annually carries a sum of money to pay for Indian ponies that are killed, but the work is not carried on by the Indian Service but by the Bureau of Animal Industry through its experts, who should be provided with ample funds.

The only way to completely eradicate this disease is to gather together the horses running on the range and test them, then kill every one of them that has it. The longer this work is postponed the more it will cost. Obviously it would be true economy to appropriate all the money that the Bureau of Animal Industry can wisely use, and they have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Budget Bureau that they can use $50,000 a year. If by petty economy, trimming off a little this year and a little the next, the work is continued for four or five years, ultimately Congress will cause the expenditure of more money in eradicating this disease than would have to be spent if adequate and proper appropriations were promptly made. Let us furnish the funds and be done with it, and I therefore ask that this item be increased as recommended in the Budget.

I am advised that affected animals were found last year in South Dakota, Montana, New Mexico, and Arizona, most of them being in the last-mentioned State. During the fiscal year 1921, 22,179 animals were tested, of which 473 were found to be diseased. The figures for the previous fiscal year were 20,117 and 336, respectively.

A further reduction of $5,000 in this appropriation will not only prevent the bureau from prosecuting the work vigorously but will result in large numbers of animals, now healthy, contracting the disease in those areas in which they are unable to test all stallions and mares of breeding age and promptly slaughter those found to be affected.

During the last two years the bureau has been compelled to postpone this work on account of reduced appropriations. Each postponement has resulted in the spread of the disease to healthy animals and has very materially increased the cost of the work over what it would have been if sufficient funds had been available to cover all known infected territory.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. The department this year expended $47,000 on this job. The appropriation has been reduced little by little, year by year, as the disease has been closed in on and has gradually grown less, and the committee was thoroughly satisfied that the work could continue satisfactorily on the basis of $45,000. I hope in view of that fact that the proposal of the gentleman from Arizona will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEAT INSPECTION.

For additional expenses in carrying out the provision of the meat inspection act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 674), as amended by the act of March 4, 1907 (34 Stat. L., p. 1256), and as extended to equine meat by the act of July 24, 1919 (41 Stat. L., p. 241), including the purchase of tags, labels, stamps, and certificates printed in course of manufacture, $891,180.

Total, Bureau of Animal Industry, $6,669,276.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota how much money is carried for meat inspection this year?

Mr. ANDERSON. In addition to the sum which the gentleman will find on page 16 there is a standing appropriation of $2,000,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. That would make the total $2,891,180. How much was spent last year?

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman mean for the fiscal year 1922—this year?

Mr. HAUGEN. I call attention to the fact that the packers have been paying for overtime about $200,000 a year, and it is now suggested that the Government should pay for overtime. Will the $891,180 be sufficient to pay for the overtime, if that should be charged to the Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so.

Mr. HAUGEN. Practically all of that amount was expended last year?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections, including the maintenance of a plant-disease survey, $77,000: Provided, That $10,000 of this amount shall be used for research in brown-rot and kindred diseases of peach trees.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NORTON: Page 18, line 23, strike out "$77,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$82,000"; also, on page 18, line 25, after the semicolon add "and that $5,000 of this amount shall be used for research in the eradicating of destructive diseases of raspberries."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to read a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture. This matter was brought to the attention of the Secretary of Agriculture after or about the time the bill was in the hands of the printer. The result was that it could not be changed by the committee. This is what the Secretary of Agriculture says on this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, February 25, 1922.

Hon. MINER G. NORTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. NORTON: I have your letter of this date, in which you refer to several diseases which are practically eradicating certain kinds of raspberries in the Western Reserve, particularly along Lake Erie, which have been brought to your attention by members of the leading agricultural societies of your State.

In reply I would say that destructive diseases of the raspberry have in recent years caused very serious reduction of the acreage devoted to this fruit in such States as New York, Ohio, and Michigan. While the exact cause of certain of the most destructive of these diseases has not yet been determined, investigations that have been prosecuted in the Bureau of Plant Industry during the past two years afford strong reason for hope that the blue stem, the most destructive of these diseases in the Great Lakes region, may be brought under control. While the work has not yet been under way long enough to permit an unqualified statement that effective and practical methods for controlling the disease are in sight, the experiments in northern Ohio are very promising, and the results of the work done by our specialists there are the basis for this expectation. The work thus far conducted is, however, on much too small a scale and during too short a time for prompt determination of the practicability of controlling the diseases under ordinary field conditions.

Our specialists who are making this investigation are strongly of the opinion that the most important step necessary in retarding the spread of the disease and rendering possible the resumption of profitable black raspberry growing where the disease is troublesome will be accomplished through the prompt and thorough eradication of all diseased plants from the fields and areas where the young plants for new acreage are grown. Unlike most fruit trees and vines, these young plants are not grown in nurseries, but are obtained in the form of rooted tips from the fields planted for fruit production. What appears to be necessary at this stage to promptly determine the practicability of this method is to thoroughly eradicate the disease from one or two typical raspberry-growing localities comprising areas of a few square miles each in order to provide a sufficient supply of disease-free plants to permit the development of new plantations with disease-free stock. Such work will, of course, need to be very carefully and thoroughly supervised by a specialist familiar with the obscure early symptoms of the disease, under whose direction the fruit growers can themselves eradicate the diseased plants.

This question is of such importance to the future of the black raspberry industry of the Lake region, which is now greatly reduced in acreage and production by these diseases, that it is a matter of importance that this phase of the work be thoroughly tested as promptly and effectively as possible. The department will consider making provision for it in connection with the estimates for the fiscal year 1924, but unfortunately this would not permit the undertaking of active work in the fields until another year has elapsed, which the raspberry growers of your region strongly desire to be undertaken at once, and which would be highly desirable to undertake if our funds permitted.

The appropriation of $5,000 for this purpose which you suggest would be sufficient for the effective handling of this work under the authority in the subappropriation for "Fruit investigations" under "General expenses in the Bureau of Plant Industry."

I want to say that this condition exists not only in northern Ohio, but I have heard that it prevails quite extensively in Michigan and northern New York and all along the Lakes, and that where they had thousands of acres a few years ago the industry is gradually being wiped out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does the gentleman know how much money the department is spending for this raspberry work now?

Mr. NORTON. Less than $5,000. I can not tell exactly. It is a very small amount.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman's amendment prevails, there will be danger that only the $5,000 mentioned in his amendment will be available. There is danger that the amount will be reduced below what the department is now spending for this purpose.

Mr. NORTON. I understand there is one person investigating this subject, but they say the disease has spread very rapidly in the last two or three years.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The bureau now finds authority for spending more than $5,000. If the amendment of the gentleman is adopted, this expenditure may be limited to $5,000.

Mr. NORTON. That is possible. I had not thought of that phase of it. If I eliminate the last half of the amendment, that will cover it. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the latter part of the amendment, leaving it simply so as to increase the amount $5,000, which will then be used for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NORTON: Page 18, line 23, strike out "$77,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$82,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to modify his amendment?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the Clerk read the balance of the amendment?

Mr. NORTON. It was to provide that the $5,000 be used for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask that the Clerk report the original amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes. I wish to hear the last part of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NORTON: Page 18, line 23, strike out "$77,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$82,000." Also on page 18, line 25, after the semicolon add "and that $5,000 of this amount shall be used for research in the eradicating of destructive diseases of raspberries."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. I have learned since that this disease is quite extensive in the three States I have mentioned, even more than I knew, and the agricultural people of Ohio are very urgent about this matter.

They say that next year it will be far beyond what it is now because it is going all over the country.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I believe if the amount is increased to $82,000, if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is adopted, the department would take into account that fact that the amount was increased so that the amount available for the raspberry proposition would be larger than has heretofore been available.

Mr. MANN. The amendment may have been offered for that reason, but the membership of the House may not vote for it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I say if the amendment is adopted the department will take into consideration the purpose for which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MANN. I would not vote for it for that reason.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman from Ohio will be satisfied if the gentleman from Illinois votes for it for any reason.

Mr. MANN. But the department is not bound to take notice that the increase was for raspberry disease.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman from Minnesota will bear me out when I say that the department does take notice of the purpose for which amendments are adopted and governs itself accordingly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the state of facts presented by the gentleman from Ohio makes this amendment a very meritorious proposition. I assume that in the absence of objection on the part of the committee it means their approval. Has the chairman of the committee any declaration to make?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments numbered 2, 19, 21, 28, 29, 31, 35, and 36, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For applying such methods of eradication or control of the white-pine blister rust as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, including the payment of such expenses and the employment of such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, and in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture no expenditures shall be made for these purposes until a sum or sums at least equal to such expenditures shall have been appropriated, subscribed, or contributed by States, county, or local authorities, or by individuals or organizations for the accomplishment of such purposes, $175,000, of which $50,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property injured or destroyed;

For the investigation of diseases of cotton, potatoes, truck crops, forage crops, drug and related plants, $117,000.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the reason for making this $50,000 immediately available?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is desirable if this increased work contemplated is to be done, that the work should commence as soon after the snow is off the ground as possible.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much was appropriated last year?

Mr. ANDERSON. The appropriation was $100,000.

Mr. MANN. What do they do with this money?

Mr. ANDERSON. This covers a large part of the organization activity in which the department furnishes the men who direct the gangs in destroying the gooseberry and currant bushes which are the hosts for the disease of white-pine blister rust.

Mr. MANN. Are these being destroyed?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; particularly in the Northern and Western States.

Mr. MANN. Domestic or wild?

Mr. ANDERSON. Wild gooseberries and currants.

Mr. MANN. Who destroys them?

Mr. ANDERSON. People employed by the private owners in some places and in others by the State. The Government expends nothing except for the organization——

Mr. MANN. I know the Government does not do it, but I wondered whether there was any effective organization.

Mr. ANDERSON. The experiment shows that if they are destroyed in a belt of 800 feet around the trees it will prevent the infection from the outside. If you eliminate the gooseberries inside that belt it will prevent the spread of the infection within the forest.

Mr. MANN. Some people have told me that the rust might be transmitted from 10 to 100 miles by the wind.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think that is true of white-pine blister.

Mr. SNELL. The investigations by the department indicate that it can not spread over 800 or 1,000 feet.

Mr. MANN. I visited a while ago a large wheat farmer and saw a lot of the common barberries scattered around and I expressed my surprise. This man is a very up-to-date farmer, and when I called attention to it he said, "Well, don't believe everything you read."

Mr. ANDERSON. The rust story is another story.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals, including corn, and methods of cereal production, and for the study and control of cereal diseases, including barberry eradication, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production, $379,705: Provided, That $147,200 shall be set aside for the location of and destruction of the barberry bushes and other vegetation from which such rust spores originate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "such," on page 20, line 20.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions, $169,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used in the free distribution, or propagation for free distribution, of cuttings, seedlings, or trees of willow, box elder, ash, caragana, or other common varieties of fruit, ornamental, or shelter-belt trees in the Northern Great Plains area, except for experimental or demonstration purposes in the States of North and South Dakota west of the one hundredth meridian, and in Montana and Wyoming east of the 5,000-foot contour line.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what advantage under the present circumstances the country may gain from spending $169,000 for the improvement of methods of crop production? If I rightly read the report of the commission of which the gentleman was a member, the present situation of the farmer is very largely due to the fact that already he is producing substantially more than can be sold. Is it quite fair that in the present need for great economy we should continue an appropriation of this sort for still further increasing the surplus of agricultural products?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think there would not be any economy in striking out this appropriation. The gentleman must remember that there are a large number of people on these arid and semiarid lands. They are farmers, and they need help in their problems if any farmers need aid, because they live in a section of the country where farming is a precarious business. If there are any farmers in the country who need assistance in their problems, these farmers do. While there is something in the suggestion which the gentleman makes with respect to the effect of agricultural production in the country, the fact is that these people are there, and they have to make a living out of the ground, and they are entitled to such assistance as the Government can give them under the circumstances.

Mr. LUCE. I do not criticize this particular item, but I would call the gentleman's attention to three quotations from the report in question, one to the effect that the increase in farm output in the last 10 years has been largely due to increase in acreage, and to a slight degree only has there been an increase in the output per acre. The second quotation to which I refer is to the same effect, that the per acre production of grain has increased at the rate of about one-half of 1 per cent per acre per annum in the last 30 years.

Mr. ANDERSON. At that point may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. Who was it that said, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book"?

Mr. LUCE. I hope he would write as good a book as this one.

The report furthermore says that the quantity of fertilizer used in the production of farm crops as well as the total expenditure for farm fertilizer has more than doubled in the last 10 years. We have doubled the quantity of fertilizer and we have not increased in any appreciable measure the yield per acre, and we are confronted to-day with a bill appropriating practically twice as much as was expended for the Agricultural Department 10 years ago. What are we getting out of it?

Mr. ANDERSON. There has been an increase in the per acre production of about one-half of 1 per cent annually, and also there has been a tremendous increase in the per man production, a very considerable part of which in my judgment is due to more effective and efficient methods worked out as a result of scientific studies, such as are carried on here.

These studies have not only to be carried on in the laboratory but they have to be carried on on the character of land where eventually they are to be applied. Problems have to be worked out in the field, and these studies are established with the idea of working out these problems in the field under the conditions which the farmer himself is confronted with. It is altogether possible that the country and these farmers themselves would be better off if they had never seen this particular part of the country, which, as I said before, is exceedingly difficult and precarious as a farming country, but they are there, and we can scarcely leave them there with no assistance whatever in the solution of the problems which they have.

Mr. LUCE. Of course, the gentleman realizes that I am not addressing myself to this particular local problem. I am somewhat disturbed by the proof laid before me, that in spite of the fact that the Nation and the States together may have expended in the last generation $1,000,000,000 for the improvement of agriculture, it is still reported to us that there is very little increase per acre in the produce of our soil, and I am wondering whether the actual net results of the expenditure of these enormous amounts of money in the field of agriculture have been justified.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it unquestionably has in the way I have suggested, by the increase in the per man production which in this country is greater than in any country in the world. The gentleman must remember that we have constantly increased our acreage, and the increased acreage has been of a low-production character, that the best acreage in the country was taken up first, and that as we go westward and take up poorer acreage, it has a tendency in the direction of keeping our average per acre production at a low point. The great development of agriculture in this country, in my judgment, in recent years has been in the increase of the per man production as distinguished from the per acre production.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman must be aware that on the other side of the water the development of intensive agriculture has been the safety of the people. We seem to be making no progress in the development of intensive agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, if the gentleman lives another hundred years he will see the same development in intensive agriculture in this country he has witnessed on the other side. We have already made great strides in this direction in many sections of the country.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. In the discussion of this particular paragraph I wish to make the statement that the chairman of the subcommittee has, I think, answered effectually the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. The extension of our agriculture into the arid sections of the country is responsible for the very slight increase shown in acreage production, because the average must include those low-producing areas.

I am a native of the great agricultural State of Iowa. I left there in 1875 and have revisited that State consecutively almost every year since I left there. I believe it will be borne out by comparative figures that the production of corn and oats in Iowa has been greatly increased through intensive cultivation. A great increase is shown, though I am not able to state the exact figures. We rediscover year after year important truths which have been known for centuries. Cato wrote a book on how to farm good pasture land profitably, and a further section was devoted to how to farm ordinary pasture land profitably and poor pasture land profitably. The farmers of the valley of the Nile, 300 years before the Christian era, knew that you could increase the product of wheat land by once mowing the wheat off, but we have rediscovered within the last decade or two in Kansas, and doubtless in the other wheat-producing areas of this country, that we can raise better wheat frequently if we pasture our wheat and get rid of the early luxuriant growth, which we believe, notwithstanding the specialists, induces and develops the rust that is often so destructive to wheat. We find by practical experience, although we can not prove it scientifically, that we raise better wheat and have less rust when we pasture our wheat. The surface methods of cultivation of arid land are well known to millions of farmers in this country. The French farmers 300 years ago knew thoroughly and well the advantages of surface cultivation and practiced it extensively.

But we have rediscovered and proclaimed it with a great hurrah and blare of trumpets within the last 15 or 20 years. Now, of course, I am pleased that the gentleman does not object to the appropriation. I think these facts are known by our practical farmers throughout the country, and the indifferent farmer gets more benefit from the example of the thoroughgoing intensive farmer in his own neighborhood than he gets from all the agricultural reports that have ever been printed by the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.] But if the indifferent farmer can have called to his attention the advantages that will follow from intensive agriculture or surface cultivation, through the methods which are now being followed and are in common use throughout the western country and which the department seeks to inculcate, I think that the money is well spent. But I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that these methods are already well established, and it seems to me that this money is almost uselessly expended, but if the result claimed can be achieved, if the attention of more farmers can be called to the object sought to be attained, the money will have been wisely appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would ask for a three-minute extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to call the attention of this committee just in a single sentence to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], made by him, that there is a great overproduction in the United States to-day of agricultural products; that this is one of the complaints we hear from all over the country. So why should we seek to further increase those products? I call the attention of the gentleman and of the committee to the fact that within the last three months the prices of all staple agricultural products have been advancing gradually and constantly; that wool selling a year ago at 23 cents a pound is now being sold for 36 for the clip before it is taken off. That the price of live hogs on the market of the country at this time, when it is not usual to expect a great advance, when we might expect a dull market, has advanced within the last 90 days approximately $4 per hundred.

I further call attention of this committee to the fact that I saw a statement this morning from the Daily Drovers Telegram, of Kansas City, that a sheep raiser and feeder of the State of Utah marketed in Kansas City 400 head of lambs that cost him on the range $5.60 at $15.50. I want further to call attention, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to the fact that a shipper from Sterling, Tex.—that must be a good town for it has a splendid name—by the name of Foster—in whose district is Sterling located?

Mr. HUDSPETH. In the best district in Texas.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Then it must be in the district of my friend HUDSPETH, the gentleman from Texas. Well, he marketed 1,500 Texas lambs in the Kansas City market last week at a high price and said in a newspaper interview in substance that the sheepman is again on his feet and prosperous, and his herds are reorganized on a paying basis.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman will recall that the gentleman from Texas, to whom he refers, voted for the emergency tariff bill.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Not only voted for it, as the gentleman from Ohio suggests, but was one of its ablest champions. Had the gentleman from Texas, who was absent on account of sickness, been here upon that fateful day when we lacked just three or four votes of getting that little duty on hides in the general bill, it would have been like a blast of the bugle from Roderick Dhu. [Applause.] It would have been worth enough Democratic votes to have carried it through. [Applause.]

And since my attention has been called thereto, I can not refrain from further allusion to the words of my good Democratic friend from Texas, Mr. HUDSPETH. I think it must have been about the 14th of last April, speaking on this very subject of the emergency tariff, which provides for a stiff duty on wool and frozen meats and other products of the farm, the gentleman from Texas, describing the sheep industry in his State, said, "Our sheep and goats are practically worth nothing; it costs 30 to 50 cents per pound to produce wool and mohair, and when it sells, it sells from 10 to 20 cents per pound." It was a most distressing condition he pictured, but not in the least overdrawn.

Those loyal people, who had supported their Government splendidly throughout the ordeal of war, who sent their sons to do battle for their country, were in the spring of 1921 on the brink of ruin. No stronger appeal for relief has ever been presented in this House than was spoken by CLAUDE HUDSPETH, of the fourteenth Texas, in the interests of a distressed constituency.

But what is the situation to-day? In all my experience of 46 years in Kansas I do not recall when there has been so complete a reversal of conditions in the brief period of less than one year. The advance in the price of all classes of cattle exceeds $2 per hundred in 90 days. If, as is estimated, there are now 70,000,000 cattle in the United States, averaging 700 pounds, it shows an increase in value on the item of cattle of $980,000,000, or, in round numbers, $1,000,000,000.

And the same is true of swine, except in a greater degree. A net advance of $3.50 has been scored in the past 90 days and sold in Kansas City this week at $11.15 per hundred.

Seven million bushels of wheat were received in Kansas City from my own State of Kansas for the month of February, at $1.40 to $1.50 per bushel cash for standard wheat. More than $10,000,000 went to the farmers and country elevators of my State in the single month of February for wheat alone. The effect of the price improvement is being reflected in almost every line of business throughout the country.

And I am pleased, and more than pleased, that the sheep and wool industry and the cattle industry, forming so large a part of the investments of the people in the district of my Democratic friend from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] are sharing in the improved and constantly improving conditions.

And while it is true that the present upward trend in the prices of many of the products of the farm is most gratifying it is also true that one great obstacle to complete fair readjustment remains yet to be removed. And that is the reduction of transportation rates, which are so high as to be almost prohibitive in some particulars. And which are an incubus on the free interchange of commodities. The proper reduction of freight rates would doubtless do more than any other one thing to give further important relief and benefit to producers and consumers and, in my candid judgment, would also increase the revenues of the railroads and thus a benefit would accrue to the entire population of the country and to all lines of business at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the proforma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation and improvement of fruits, and the methods of fruit growing, harvesting, handling, and studies of the physiological and related changes of fruits during the processes of marketing and while in commercial storage, $114,200.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 15, strike out "$114,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$121,700."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of Plant Industry succeeded in convincing the Director General of the Budget that this appropriation should be increased this year to $121,000. A part of that increase, I understand from the hearings, is made up by a transfer from the Bureau of Markets which the committee has allowed. But I understand that some of the items asked for and demonstrated to be necessary to the Bureau of the Budget were not allowed by the Committee on Appropriations, and for that reason I have offered this amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the gentleman that the appropriation which I suppose he has in mind, which is a very important matter, involves the increase of $9,000 more for bud-selection work, and it is included in this item, but the item of $23,000 covered from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics into this item was not allowed.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understood that the increase asked for in this appropriation was, in part, to be applied to strengthening the remarkable investigations into the bud selection of superior strains of citrus fruits.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is taken care of.

Mr. HAYDEN. In the citrus-growing regions of southern California and Arizona it has been demonstrated that in many groves there are what might be called "loafer" trees, just as has been shown by the Babcock test in the dairy industry that there are "boarder" cows that are not worth their keep. When buds are selected from trees by going into an orchard without knowing anything about the parent trees, very frequently buds are obtained from a tree that does not produce a good quality or a proper quantity of fruit. This is a question that is of immense interest to the citrus fruit growing industry everywhere, and I am glad, indeed, to be advised that the committee has allowed the full amount for this important work.

These investigations will be of the greatest value to my State. A large sum of money is soon to be expended in the development of the Yuma mesa, largely with the idea of growing citrus fruits there. It is of the utmost importance that investigations on bud selection, such as those carried on in California, be extended to Arizona in order to find strains of citrus fruit that can endure the hot dry weather of the summer and give large yields of choice fruit. It is no exaggeration to say that the success or failure of the Yuma mesa project as a citrus-fruit region may in the end depend on whether or not these investigations are made.

Mr. ANDERSON. The committee had that in mind.

Mr. HAYDEN. I therefore withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experiment farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 18, 1900, $70,500: Provided, That the limitations in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the meaning of the limitation on the cost of buildings?

Mr. ANDERSON. The removal of the limitations on the cost of buildings, of course, is not new in this paragraph. That proviso has been carried for many years.

Mr. HAUGEN. It does not make it permanent law?

Mr. ANDERSON. The increase in the appropriation is to cover the installation of a new set of boilers in the heating plant at the Arlington farm.

Mr. HAUGEN. This is not the building?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; it covers the heating plant.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much is to be used for the heating plant?

Mr. ANDERSON. Twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. HAUGEN. And the other is for building it?

Mr. ANDERSON. And the other $20,000 is the regular maintenance item.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the amount carried last year for the building. Has not the building been completed?

Mr. ANDERSON. That was not for the building. This $20,500 is for the maintenance of the farm, and the $50,000 additional covers the installation of a new set of boilers and the boiler house.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then the additional appropriation is for the boilers, and that is necessary to be done?

Mr. ANDERSON. Absolutely.

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of new and rare seeds; for the investigation and improvement of grasses, alfalfa, clover, and other forage crops, including the investigation of the utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants, $130,000: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $56,600 may be used for the purchase and distribution of such new and rare seeds.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANGLEY: Page 26, after line 7, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $360,000. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated; and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph. It is not germane to the section of the bill and is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make it or reserve it?

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact——

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, it never seemed to me that a point of order to this particular paragraph needed any particular discussion. It is so obviously legislation that it does not seem to me necessary to make any argument with respect to it. In the first place, there is not any law that I am aware of which authorizes a congressional seed distribution. The paragraph, outside of that portion of it which provides an appropriation, contains a series of directions to the Secretary of Agriculture as to the method of making this distribution, for which there is no law whatever. Now, of course, you can attach certain restrictions, limitations, and requirements to the expenditure of an appropriation, but these provisions are directions to the Secretary of Agriculture and not in the nature of limitations upon the expenditure of the money at all. They are in the nature of legislative direction to the Secretary of Agriculture as to what shall be done after the appropriation has been spent for the purchase of seeds. It provides, for instance, for due advertisement and competitive bids. It provides that an equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, cuttings, plants, and so forth, shall be supplied to Senators and Representatives, for which there is no authority of law. It provides——

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me at that point?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Perhaps I can shorten the discussion a bit—I hope I can, at least—by calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is an exact copy of the amendment offered last year by me, and which became a part of the law of the land, and that the same question which he is now discussing, including the point that several new provisions of law were proposed, was discussed fully then. The same gentleman who occupies the chair now occupied it then, and ruled then that it was in order, and in so ruling followed the ruling which had been adopted by a previous Chairman of the Committe of the Whole.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is aware of the fact, and because he is aware of it he has been at some pains to direct the Chairman's attention to the fact, that there are many reasons why the ruling he made last year was erroneous.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anybody desire to discuss this question on the point of order? If not, the Chair will rule.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, practically all I wanted to say I said in my colloquy with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON]. I assume that the Chair will notice that I made a literally correct statement of what occurred last year, and so far as I am concerned I think the Chair fully understands the question. Therefore I do not care to take up the time of the committee further, although I am very anxious to make a speech on this subject.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no question about the point of order. I think the organic law makes it clear that the amendment is in order. The law says:

There shall be at the seat of government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make a statement in regard to the point of order. As the gentleman from Kentucky a few days ago kindly informed the Chair of his intention to offer the amendment, the Chair has had opportunity of studying the question, and will ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes in order to present his views on this much-controverted subject.

As this congressional seed distribution proposition has for many years been the subject of discussion and uncertainty, the Chair, with the able assistance of the parliamentary clerk, has taken occasion to look up the history of the subject.

The Chair finds as early as 1904 the point of order relating to this proposition was presented to the House, and that since then, either against a paragraph in the bill itself or against an amendment, it has claimed the attention of Members of Congress.

On February 5, 1904, with Mr. Powers, of Maine, in the chair, Mr. Sheppard, of Texas, made a point of order against that part of the item relating to the method of distribution of the seeds. The Chair on that occasion sustained the point of order.

During the consideration of the bill in 1906 Mr. Wadsworth, of New York, made a point of order against the proposition, and while the subject was thoroughly discussed, as the point of order was withdrawn, no decision was rendered by the Chairman.

On January 29, 1907, Mr. Candler, of Mississippi, offered the amendment providing for congressional seed distribution. Mr. Foster, of Vermont, occupied the chair at that time, and Mr. MANN, of Illinois, reserved a point of order against the amendment, but later withdrew it. The objection having been renewed by Mr. Jones, of Washington, the Chair sustained it. On an appeal from this decision, by a teller vote of 84 ayes and 136 noes, the Chair was overruled. At that time, while the Chair seemed clear on the parliamentary merits of the case, he recognized the fact that there was some confusion in the rulings.

On March 19, 1914, when Mr. Hamlin, of Missouri, was presiding, the question was again presented and fully discussed. Mr. SUMNERS, of Texas, made a point of order against the item, but the objection was overruled by the Chair.

On February 21, 1921, when the present occupant of the chair was presiding during the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, Mr. LANGLEY, of Kentucky, offered the seed-distribution amendment, against which a point of order was made by Mr. BLANTON, of Texas. The Chair in rendering his decision stated that—

The ruling which the Chair is going to make is in direct opposition to the real opinion of the Chairman, but he founds it entirely on the precedent established by this committee a number of years ago, when it, by a decisive vote, overruled the Chairman and held in order this proposition.

The Chair finds that the general law relating to seed distribution provides (sec. 526, R. S.) that—

The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

Thirty-ninth United States, page 741, provides:

The Public Printer shall furnish to the Department of Agriculture such franks as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for sending out seeds on congressional orders, the franks to have printed thereon the facsimile signatures of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; also the names of their respective States or Territories, and the words "United States Department of Agriculture, congressional seed distribution," or such other printed matter as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, the franks to be of such size and style as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; the expense of printing the said franks to be charged to the allotment for printing and binding for the two Houses of Congress.

Eighteenth Statutes, 343, provides:

Seeds transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, or by any Member of Congress or Delegate receiving seeds for distribution from said department, together with agricultural reports emanating from that department, and so transmitted, shall, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe, pass through the mails free of charge. And the provisions of this section shall apply to ex-Members of Congress and ex-Delegates for the period of nine months after the expiration of their terms as Members and Delegates.

The Chair finds that while there is existing law authorizing the purchase of seeds by the Department of Agriculture and authorization for the printing of franks by the Public Printer, as well as law providing for the transmission of seeds through the mails, the Chair fails to find any authorization for the congressional distribution of seeds, or any authorization permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into contract for a period of years for the packing, assembling, mailing of the seeds, or for the procurement of containers in which to ship them, or any authorization for the method to be pursued by the Secretary of Agriculture in making the distribution. These provisions have been carried in appropriation bills for many years and are merely current law, and as such are on their face prima facie evidence of legislation, because if such provisions were permanent legislation they would have long ago been dropped from the appropriation bill, since if permanent they would be mere repetition of unnecessary verbiage. However, the Chair has examined the statutes carefully and has been unable to find any permanent law except the three statutes above quoted.

The Chair is cognizant of the desirability of maintaining uniformity in the matter of precedents, and recognizes the fact that without such uniformity decisions would become largely arbitrary and personal and would lead to confusion.

The Chair realizes also that it has been the custom in deciding parliamentary questions to pay great deference to former decisions. The Chair does not forget that it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to found his decision upon parliamentary laws and procedure, without reference to the expediency of the legislation proposed or to the sentiment of the committee.

The Chair also feels that when a committee establishes a ruling the motives of those voting on the decision should not be questioned. The fact that this proposition has for years been carried upon the statutes, while it may be indicative of policy, can have no binding force, for it frequently happens that many items are retained in bills not because they are free from parliamentary objections but because no points of order are made against them.

This amendment proposes legislation upon an appropriation bill and provides for an appropriation for a purpose not authorized by law.

While the Chair feels that this amendment is subject to the point of order under Rule XI, and would so rule were it brought before him as an original proposition, yet he feels that an individual opinion should not be set against precedent established by the committee itself.

The Chair, despite the precedent of 1907 and other decisions, in justice to his own opinion, can not bring himself to the point of rendering a decision which would seem to emasculate Rule XXI and vitiate the many decisions rendered in conformity to it. On the other hand, realizing fully the value which the House has always placed on precedents, the Chair is loath to reverse them by a formal declaration, even though his own opinion is not in accord with these particular precedents, and notwithstanding the fact that he feels the recognized procedure of the House would warrant the Chair in sustaining the point of order.

In view of the strictness with which the rules of the House are now interpreted in reference to the demarcation between the legislation and appropriation powers of the several committees, the Chair feels that it is proper that the question should be determined by the committee itself in order that it may decide whether the ruling of the committee rendered 18 years ago is acceptable at the present time.

The Chair is also fortified in his suggestion to refer the matter to the committee by entertaining the view that when the opinion of the Chair is at variance with the opinion of the committee the proper procedure is to ask the committee to make the ruling. Therefore the Chair is going to let the committee determine whether this amendment is or is not in order on this appropriation bill. Are you ready for the question, gentlemen? [Cries of "Question!"]

The question is, Shall the amendment be considered in order? Those in favor will answer "aye"; those opposed, "no."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 46.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore the opinion of the committee is that the amendment is in order.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote just taken discloses that a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. ANDERSON. I move to strike out "$360,000" and insert "$240,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON to the amendment offered by Mr. LANGLEY: Strike out the figures "$360,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$240,000."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the whole amendment; but with the reduction in the cost of seed and with the reduction in the cost of envelopes and other items connected with this distribution, $360,000 in the next fiscal year will be altogether more than is necessary in order to do this thing upon a fairly reasonable basis for the Members of the House and Senate. If the Members desire to do this and do it in a reasonably economical and efficient way, $240,000 will do it in that way. It is simply a question whether you are going to be reasonably economical or whether you are going to spend the taxpayers' money like a bunch of drunken sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSEYER) there were—ayes 63, noes 97.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. ANDERSON to the amendment of Mr. LANGLEY was rejected.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, in the confusion we could not hear the announcement of the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] was lost.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, not to engage in debate upon the main proposition but in order that next fall we may be able to refer to the fact that when the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill informed the House that this work could be done for $240,000 instead of $360,000 only two gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House rose to support his amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I sincerely trust that this question will be resurrected next November, and when you go out to get the farmers' vote of this country I want them to understand that there were only two Democrats who voted against giving the farmers the garden seed that they have been getting for over one hundred and twenty years. Mr. Jefferson, the father of Democracy, instituted the distribution of seed by the Government. I have always voted for this small appropriation. I do not care how many of you Republicans vote against this item so far as politics is concerned. But I am rather at a disadvantage, for this reason, that if I wanted a really good political issue I would like to have something pointing the way the wind blows; but unfortunately enough of the overwhelming Republican majority have voted in favor of giving seed to the farmers, so that now they have taken that issue away from me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman misunderstood my statement. Only two Democrats voted against reducing the amount of the appropriation to the sum which the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ANDERSON] said was sufficient to give a proper distribution of seeds. They voted, not against the distribution of seeds but against economy in the distribution of seeds.

Mr. SISSON. If you want to get right down to the facts, I happen to know something about this subject, and $360,000 will not be enough to give seed to every congressional district. The appropriation ought to be increased.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wish it was $450,000 instead of $360,000, speaking for myself personally.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 145, noes 65.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general administrative expenses connected with the above-mentioned lines of investigation, including the office of the chief of bureau, the assistant chief of bureau, the officers in charge of publications, records, supplies, and property, and for miscellaneous expenses incident thereto, $25,980; in all, general expenses, $2,425,050; total, Bureau of Plant Industry, $2,922,610.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals in the bill in accordance with the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct the totals of the bill in accordance with the action of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On account of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] a moment ago I want to call attention to the last vote, which shows that with a Republican majority of 165 or more in the House there were only 65 who voted against the seed proposition.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. I counted the Democrats who voted against the seed proposition, and I discovered six, certainly, and one who kept bobbing up and down so fast that I could not decide which way he voted.

Mr. PADGETT. That is all right. We do not conceal where we stand, but with 165 Republican majority you could muster only 65 to vote against the distribution of seeds.

Mr. CRISP. With a Republican membership of 305 in the House there were only 65 who voted against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the selection, classification, and segregation of lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be opened to homestead settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests; for the examination and appraisal of lands in effecting exchanges authorized by law and for the survey thereof by metes and bounds or otherwise, by employees of the Forest Service, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and for the survey and platting of certain lands, chiefly valuable for agriculture, now listed or to be listed within the national forests, under the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 233), and the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stats., p. 1095), as provided by the act of March 4, 1913, $60,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 32, after line 12, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For training and instruction of officers and employees of the Forest Service necessary for effective protection and administration of the national forests, $20,000."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it has been the experience of those engaged in fighting fires in the national forests that there is great necessity for instructing the officers of the Forest Service in the proper methods of carrying out that most important work. The Forest Service was able to convince the Secretary of Agriculture and the Director General of the Budget that an appropriation such as I have proposed would be in the nature of real economy. Congress has at different times appropriated large sums, millions of dollars in a single year, for fighting forest fires. The Forest Service is convinced, as a result of this costly experience, that if the forest officers and employees can be gathered together and given proper instructions in the best methods of fighting fires it will be possible to save large sums of money.

It seems to me that if the Forest Service can convince the hard-headed Director of the Budget that an appropriation of $20,000, such as I have offered, will actually result in economy, then Congress should promptly carry out his recommendation. When Congress is suddenly informed that great fires are burning in the national forests, we promptly appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars to meet the emergency. But why not spend a little money for preparedness?

An inspection and analysis of the history of bad forest fires has shown that inexperienced and inexpert forest officers have been responsible for much of the losses of the national forest resources and expenditures of public money in suppressing the fires. Should this item of $20,000 be made available it is planned to provide an intensive preliminary training for forest officers who, in connection with their duties on the national forest, will be called upon to assume the responsibility arising in connection with the detection and suppression of forest fires.

Knowledge and skill in this work does not come to men naturally, nor is it possible to hire men who are expert in fire protection. There are no private or public schools where such instruction can be secured. It is indeed wasteful for forest officers to secure all this training and experience at the expense of burning forests. The values saved on a single fire would more than equal this expense. The purpose of my amendment is to make possible this special training in advance of the fire season.

Those in direct charge of the work have carefully studied the question and arrived at the conclusion that by gathering together the men whose duty it is to undertake this work, to supervise the crews of men who will be hurriedly engaged to put out the fires, will result in real economy; and if so, why not practice it? Why follow a cheeseparing plan of apparently saving a little here and a little there, when in the end the Government will have to expend thousands of dollars more? I am surprised that the Committee on Appropriations, friendly as it usually is to the Forest Service, did not include this item in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think there is something in the suggestion of the gentleman from Arizona as to this item, but I do not think there is enough to justify the proposition at this time, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of tree seed, cones, and nursery stock, for seeding and tree planting within national forests, and for experiments and investigations necessary for such seeding and tree planting, $120,640: Provided, That from the nurseries on the Nebraska National Forest the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may furnish young trees free, so far as they may be spared, to residents of the territory covered by "An act increasing the area of homesteads in a portion of Nebraska," aproved April 28, 1904.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the sum "$120,640" and insert the figures "$125,640."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 12, strike out the figures "$120,640" and insert in lieu thereof "$125,640."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, in transferring the proviso from another place in the bill to this place we did not transfer the money which should be transferred to cover it, and the amendment I offer is intended for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the committee voted on the question of the free distribution of seeds throughout the country, and there were quite a number who voted against it. A few days ago the House voted on the question of appropriation for the purchase of seed for certain people who were in distress in the country, and more than one-third of the House voted against it. But here is an item which any Member of the House could have stricken out by simply making a point of order, but no Member has made the point of order, not even those who are opposed to the free distribution of seeds or those opposed to the appropriation of money to purchase seed for the farmers in need of it.

Here is an item that gives trees away for nothing. While it says "surplus trees," of course everyone knows that it means that they raise the trees for that purpose. The only way they have a surplus is to raise the trees, and then when they have the surplus they give them away. Yet nobody, not even our distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], makes a point of order against the item, which has all the fault of the free-seed distribution. Not even the committee that reported it objects to it, although opposed to the free distribution of seed. The committee is quite willing to give the plants away after the Government has gone to the expense of purchasing the seeds, planting them and raising the trees. I think it is a good thing to do. I have wondered whether the most of the Members who are opposed to free-seed distribution opposed it because they know it will go through, and then omit to make a point of order on this item because they know that if they do the item will go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has just spoken, wonders whether some of those who voted against the free-seed appropriation did not do so really hoping that the appropriation would nevertheless be adopted. I am one of those who, ever since I have been in Congress, have voted against the appropriation for free seeds, and I have no hesitation in recording myself against it now. I have done this largely because this appropriation has been a favorite theme for newspaper paragraphers, who sought to belittle Congress, and I think they have been successful to a certain extent. This appropriation has often been called political graft, and there are many people who believe that Congressmen desire the seed distribution solely for political purposes. I give the gentlemen who voted for the appropriation credit for desiring to accomplish a beneficial object by the distribution of this seed, and I am quite ready to admit that in many instances it has served a good purpose. But, Mr. Chairman, whatever benefits may be received from this source are, to my mind, by no means commensurate with the expenditure which is carried by the appropriation which has been adopted by the committee. In other words, the benefits are small to the persons who receive these seeds in comparison to the expense.

But that is not all. I doubt whether any Congressman gets any benefit from the seed distribution in a political way, and it is more or less expense and trouble to all Members of Congress who undertake to make use of it. I have hoped for a long time that we would be able to get rid of this burden, but gentlemen on the other side of the House have furnished the votes which were necessary to keep it in the Agricultural appropriation bill. There probably was a time when the distribution of garden and flower seeds by the Government enabled people to get a better grade of seeds than they could otherwise obtain. Indeed, the original theory of this distribution was that thereby rare and useful varieties would be distributed. Whatever there might have been in this original proposition, nothing of the kind obtains now. The seeds are, with few exceptions, very ordinary in quality and often not entirely reliable. I can see nothing in the plan which justifies the expenditure of $360,000 or even $200,000, and hope that when the bill is finally enacted into law this item will not be contained in it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. We are having an experience meeting, and I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that I am very glad to take the trouble to distribute these seeds to the people in my district, because they want them. The schoolteachers write to me for them, and they have their flower gardens and they teach the children how to make flower gardens and vegetable gardens. The cotton-mill people have their little gardens, and they get their houses pretty cheap, provided by the cotton mills. The cotton-mill people write to me for these seeds; they are glad to have them. I think it is one of the privileges of the Congressmen to once in awhile be able to send back to the people something real from this Congress up here. We bombard them with speeches and with all kinds of literature and all that kind of thing that is useful for some purposes on the farm, but for not many. We send them absolutely nothing direct from Congress except the seeds. I will say for the people in my country that they not only want them, but they commend them. I have had letter after letter in the last few days in respect to the improvement in the seeds in the last two or three years. I have distributed my quota and I have managed to obtain an additional amount. It will take all of them to supply my needs. If the gentleman from Iowa wants to part with any of his and not have the trouble of sending them to his constituents, I would be very glad to get some of them and send them out to mine.

The Clerk read as follows:

For silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments and investigations, independently or in cooperation with other branches of the Federal Government, with States and with individuals, to determine the best methods for the conservative management of forest and forest lands, $85,000.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This paragraph makes the appropriation for the existing forest experiment stations of the country. Some time ago, at the request of several patriotic, public-spirited citizens and some associations in my State, I introduced a bill to make an appropriation for the purpose of establishing a forest experiment station in one of the States of the Great Lakes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will wait a moment until I make a brief statement, I shall be glad to yield to him.

The necessity for these experiment stations and the work which they are doing is well explained in the testimony of Mr. E. H. Clapp, the assistant forester in charge of forest products in the Department of Agriculture. His testimony on this subject is very illuminating. It appears on page 221 and the pages immediately following of the hearings before the subcommittee that reports this bill.

There are at present only three forest experiment stations in the whole country, one located in North Carolina, one in Louisiana, and one, I believe, in Montana. The testimony is that there ought to be available from forty to fifty thousand dollars per year for each one of these stations, and this item provides for the three stations only $85,000. It is obvious, therefore, that it will be impossible for the department to establish out of this appropriation any additional experiment stations to those already in operation. The committee has reported the full amount for this purpose that was recommended by the Director of the Budget; and, following the general policy of the Appropriations Committee not to increase the appropriation as recommended by the Director of the Budget, the subcommittee reports this item as it is, although the need for a greater appropriation is very urgent.

I think it is conceded by all those who have made any particular study of the question that there ought to be more forest experiment stations throughout the country.

The forests of the country are being rapidly depleted, and there must be some intensive reforestation work done if we are to keep up with the consumption. Mr. Clapp in his testimony says that the annual consumption of timber in the United States is 26,000,000,000 cubic feet, and that we are growing only about 6,000,000,000 cubic feet per year to replace this annual consumption of 26,000,000,000 feet. To produce the amount consumed he very well says "we have got to practice intensive forestry. The only way we can get the basis for this intensive practice," he continues, "is through the work of our forestry experiment stations." He goes on to give the number of acres in the United States which ought to be reforested. "We have some 80,000,000 acres of forest land in the United States to-day which are practically unproductive, growing practically nothing. In addition," he says, "there are in the neighborhood of 245,000,000 acres which are covered with second growth, only a part of which is producing what the land ought to produce, and a large part of which is producing only a fraction of what the land ought to produce." It is well known how the forest lands of the States of the Great Lakes have been depleted, and Mr. Clapp makes the statement that notwithstanding this territory has been such a great producer of forest products in the past and "for many years supplied a large part of the whole country," it is now "barely self-supporting," and probably within 10 years it will be importing forest products instead of exporting them. To show the necessity of having a forest experiment station in this territory at the earliest practicable moment, I desire to quote this brief statement from the testimony of Mr. Clapp:

The history of the Lake States as a lumber-producing region is so recent that it is pretty well understood; there are just a few figures bearing on it, which I would like to mention, however. The maximum production of white pine lumber in the year 1892 was in the neighborhood of 9,000,000,000 board feet. Up to this time the Lake States had supplied the great lumber markets of the Middle West and the East. Lumber even went into the South, and as far west as Denver. Production in 1921 had fallen to approximately 1,000,000,000 board feet.

The cut of Michigan, which for 25 years was the leading lumber-producing State in the United States, was in the last report (I am speaking still of white pine) less than half of the cut of white pine in the State of Massachusetts.

Wisconsin, which led the country in lumber production in 1900, produces less white pine lumber now than either Maine or New Hampshire. Wisconsin consumes some 800,000 cords of pulp wood each year, and one-third of that comes from outside of the State. The forest area of the Lake States is in the neighborhood of 46,500,000 acres. Of this the best information we can get indicates that 20,000,000 acres are idle land. One of the great problems is the reforestation of that enormous area.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. There has been some confusion I find in the minds of some in that they have failed to distinguish between a forest-products laboratory and a forest experiment station. A forest-products laboratory has to do with the utilization of timber after it is grown, and a forest experiment station is for the purpose of growing timber. A forest experiment station must be in the area where it is proposed to grow the timber. Mr. Clapp very clearly draws the distinction between these two propositions in his statement before the committee.

He says:

The general purpose of the forest experiment stations is to perform the same function in relation to timber growing that the agricultural experiment stations do for agriculture and the growing of farm crops. They are to secure the technical and scientific basis for reforestation and for the protection and growing of timber. There is a clear-cut distinction between the work of these stations and the work of the forest-products laboratory. The stations find out how to grow timber, and the laboratory is to find out how to utilize timber effectively.

At another point he says:

We have to go to the woods to solve these problems. We can not carry the problems to a laboratory as we can problems of wood utilization. For example, if we want to try out methods of planting we must use the species in the region we are studying and plant under the conditions in that region or the results will not be good.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not making a motion to increase this appropriation, because I am in sympathy with the effort of the Committee on Appropriations to keep down the appropriations this year to a minimum, and especially to keep within the recommendations of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, but I did want to take advantage of this opportunity to call attention to the bill which I have introduced to establish a forest experiment station in one of the States of the Great Lakes and to the importance of this work in general and the necessity or the desirability of increasing the appropriation for this purpose at the very earliest opportunity consistent with the economy program of the Congress this year.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, cabins, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests, $400,000: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 may be expended for the construction and maintenance of boundary and range division fences, counting corrals, stock driveways and bridges, the development of stock watering places, and the eradication of poisonous plants on the national forests: Provided further, That hereafter no part of any funds appropriated for the Forest Service shall be used to pay the transportation or traveling expenses of any forest officer or agent except he be traveling on business directly connected with the Forest Service and in furtherance of the works, aims, and objects specified and authorized by law: And provided further, That hereafter no part of any funds appropriated for the Forest Service shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article, but this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons, without discrimination, including newspapers and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 13, strike out "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$450,000."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation was approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and Bureau of the Budget in the sum of $450,000, and my amendment is to increase it to that amount. The appropriation carried for this purpose during the last two years has been $400,000, but the amount is inadequate. For three years, in 1918, 1919, and 1920, this appropriation was fixed at $450,000. The reduction, made on the alleged ground of economy, is again proposed, which simply means that the Forest Service must choose between expenditures for the protection of the national forests against fire and for the construction of drift fences, boundary fences, and other range improvements necessary in connection with the grazing of live stock in these forests.

As a matter of fact, the stockmen who have grazing permits on national forests have been compelled to build drift fences for their own protection and at their own expense in addition to paying the required grazing fees. It is unfair that this added burden should be placed upon them, but if Congress fails to appropriate the required funds, they must continue to dig down in their own pockets at a time when the live-stock industry is far from prosperous. This increase of $50,000 is less than 2½ per cent of the more than $2,000,000 paid into the Federal Treasury each year by stockmen as grazing fees.

The national forests, of course, were primarily created for the protection of the timber, and the Forest Service will take this money, which can be spent for either purpose, and expend it for fire protection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the estimates this year did carry an increase of $50,000 in this appropriation, not for the purpose which the gentleman from Arizona suggests but for the purpose of the construction of lookout houses and certain dwellings for rangers and other purposes of that sort. This $50,000 would be wholly useless for the purpose for which the Forest Service desires to use it without the language which they proposed to insert, and in view of the fact there has been no estimate for the purpose that the gentleman from Arizona suggests, it seems to me that the amendment which he proposes should not be agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman from Minnesota will yield, it appears upon the face of this appropriation that the money may be used for either purpose—roads, trails, fire lanes, telephone lines, and so forth—but the proviso states that $50,000 may be expended for the construction and maintenance of boundary and range division fences and other range improvements. If the gentleman will investigate, he will find that but little of this money has been used for the latter purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON. But the $50,000 is for the purpose of constructing lookout stations and dwellings for rangers.

That $50,000 can not be spent for that purpose without additional legislation, and there is no use of appropriating it without the language.

Mr. HAYDEN. What specific legislation is necessary?

Mr. ANDERSON. The legislation this department asked for was for the purchase of lands needed for ranger stations and for 20 buildings to be erected at a cost of not exceeding $3,000 each. That was in the language that he asked for. It is clearly subject to a point of order. We think there is sufficient money for the purposes covered by this paragraph. Certainly in the aggregate there is more money year by year for roads and trails and purposes of that kind than there ever has been before. This increase was for the specific purposes for which the department estimates, which purposes, as I say, are subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can not for the life of me see how a point of order could be sustained against providing the necessary housing for forest guards. That must be included in the expense of fire protection which is authorized by law. There is $50,000 mentioned in the proviso which may be expended, but which is not expended because the principal sum must be used for fire-protection purposes. I am well satisfied that if the total appropriation is increased by $50,000, that sum will be expended on boundary fences and other range improvements. So the gentleman from Minnesota must be mistaken in the conclusion that he has reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. STEVENSON, and Mr. MAPES were granted unanimous consent to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture more effectively to carry out the provisions of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat., p. 961), entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," $27,000 of the moneys appropriated therein, or for carrying out its purposes, shall be available for the employment of agents, title attorneys, clerks, assistants, and other labor, and for the purchase of supplies and equipment required for the purpose of said act in the city of Washington.

Total, Forest Service, $6,532,302.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether this $27,000 appropriated here is to be a part of the $50,000 that is set out in the acquisition of additional forest land, on page 71 of the act?

Mr. ANDERSON. As the gentleman probably understands, there is a statute which prohibits the payment of salaries in the city of Washington except where specifically authorized by law. This covers the salaries in the city of Washington, the title attorneys and examiners in the various services under the commission, while the other item covers the field service.

Mr. KINCHELOE. This says:

Twenty-seven thousand dollars of the money appropriated therein.

What does that mean?

Mr. ANDERSON. That refers to the original appropriation under the Weeks Act.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will say to the gentleman that I interrogated him in his opening statement as to the acquisition of this forest land on the extension of the Weeks Act. There was a bill reported, upon my motion, by the Committee on Agriculture yesterday perpetuating the Weeks Act another year, with a maximum appropriation of $1,000,000 for the calendar year of 1923, and I was wondering whether there was any chance, either here or in the other body, to get that appropriation in, so that the work will go on next year.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would not care to express an opinion on that proposition—at this time, at least.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collaboration with other departments of the Government desiring chemical investigations and whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work, $14,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, 100 years ago to-day my father was born on a farm near Ithaca, N. Y. All his lifetime was spent in farming and related occupations. In honor of his memory I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks upon this bill, dealing with problems in which he was so vitally concerned during all the 75 years of his busy life. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $168,500.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that this appropriation is reduced by $10,000. The Budget Bureau did not make any such recommendation.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he overlooked that the $10,000 of this appropriation was immediately available last year and was spent the preceding year, so that the amount of this item is exactly the same as the amount spent this year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Nevertheless, my statement is correct that the Director General of the Budget, the chief guardian of economy, recommended that the sum appropriated for this purpose should be $178,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. With due regard, we do not yield to him in ability to find places where the money is not required.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand the situation there are a number of field stations which must be closed if this cut is made. During the present fiscal year there has been but one man in charge of these stations in many instances, which is distinctly disadvantageous for successful work. But it is apparently useless to offer amendments, as I have repeatedly demonstrated this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting southern field crops, including insects affecting cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar cane, etc., and the cigarette beetle and Argentine ant, $150,000.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILSON: Page 43, line 7, after the word "ant," strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$165,000."

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, this estimate and recommendation was cut $15,000 by the committee. I feel that if the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union could only appreciate the conditions in the cotton belt relative to the control of the cotton boll weevil they would concede that this amendment ought to be adopted.

This item relates to the control of the cotton boll weevil. There is a very acute situation in the whole cotton belt. There is not a single cotton-producing State but what is infested by the cotton boll weevil, and since this bill was reported the department has given out an announcement that in the coming season we may expect the heaviest infestation of the boll weevil ever known. A statement also was given out from New York by the manufacturing and financial interests that the whole cotton surplus would be about 4,000,000 bales of low-grade cotton and the demand and need for the cotton requires the production of a large crop. It is difficult under the present boll-weevil conditions to produce cotton. The experiments carried out during the year 1921 show an increase in production wherever there has been the proper application of calcium arsenate, and it holds out the only hope of the cotton-producing section for the control of this pest. It seems there will be no possibility of producing cotton except under boll-weevil conditions, and I think it is to the interest of the entire country, both the cotton producers and consumers, that Congress furnish the estimated amount found necessary by the department for this important work.

I will call the attention of the committee to the results in each State briefly. Take, for example, the State of Louisiana. At the station at Tallulah, where this calcium-arsenate method of control was properly applied, the increase ranged from 77 to 659 pounds per acre, while the percentage of increase due to poisoning ranged from 7.91 per cent to 84.6 per cent.

At Brookhaven, Miss., the gains in seed cotton per acre ranged from 138.9 to 344.7 pounds, while the percentage increase due to poisoning ranged from 21.9 per cent to 49.9 per cent.

At Demopolis, Ala., the three tests conducted at this point showed a range in seed cotton per acre gain of from 4 to 408 pounds. The percentage of increase ranged from 0.6 per cent to 95.7 per cent.

At Tuscaloosa, Ala., the only test plat carried to completion at this point showed a yield of 750 pounds of seed cotton per acre on the unpoisoned check, and 874 pounds on the poisoned, or a gain of 124 pounds of seed cotton per acre, or 16.5 per cent.

At Taylor, Tex., the test conducted ranged from a loss of 2 pounds to a gain of 215 pounds per acre, or from a loss of 0.8 per cent to a gain of 122.1 per cent.

At Waynesboro, Ga., the tests ranged from 203 to 397 pounds of seed cotton per acre, or a gain of from 40.8 per cent to 331.7 per cent. All unpoisoned plants showed an average yield of 343.6 pounds, while the poisoned plants averaged 641.6 pounds. The increase was thus 298 pounds, or 86.7 per cent. In every case these tests showed a very profitable increase in the yield of cotton when this method of control was used.

At Fairfax, S. C., the tests ranged in increased yield from 101 to 197 pounds of seed cotton per acre, or a gain of from 43.5 per cent to 172.2 per cent.

Although the committee has recommended this cut in the appropriation I believe this would be one instance where the best interests of the entire country would be subserved by restoring the appropriation to the original estimate, and therefore I have offered my amendment to increase the amount from $150,000 to $165,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize very much with the situation to which the gentleman from Louisiana has referred. The committee has no disposition whatever to curtail the work which is being done on the cotton boll weevil. As a matter of fact, the testimony shows that the department was expecting to spend this year $112,000 for the cotton work, which is approximately $24,000 more than they spent in the current year, and $12,000 on sugar investigation, and $24,000 on tobacco investigation, making a total of $148,000. As a matter of fact, they expect to spend only $143,000 in the current year. So we felt that the amount appropriated here would be sufficient to carry the work on its present basis through the next fiscal year and leave a small amount of leeway. The estimates that were presented to us showed an increase of $20,000 for traveling expenses, but we were advised that that was an error, and that all they expected to spend was $40,000, or an increase of $10,000 over last year.

Taking all of these factors into consideration, we felt that the sum of $150,000 would enable them to conduct that work very satisfactorily.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Has the gentleman's attention been called to the fact that just within the last few days the Department of Agriculture has given notice of an expected increase in the boll-weevil infestation? Dr. Hunter, of the department, came to see me this morning, and they are very much alarmed over that prospect. The department are very anxious to have the additional amount if the House of Representatives feel disposed to recommend it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not heard of that, but I have noticed that about the time the Agricultural appropriation bill gets under way somebody discovers something which very much alarms him, which will require an immediate appropriation of Federal money to control.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am anxious to know whether it is possible to exterminate the boll weevil. When I first came to Congress, some 18 or 20 years ago, a small appropriation was asked for to exterminate what was known as a weevil that was about to destroy the cotton crop down in Texas, and it was stated that if it was not done the weevil would get over into Mississippi and Alabama and other Southern States. The appropriation has grown from year to year, yet there are more boll weevils in the country to-day than there were at that time. Of what avail is it? How do they do? Do the Department of Agriculture send a man down there to kill individual boll weevils, or what is done? How is it that the weevils propagate so rapidly?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I will endeavor to answer his questions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I should like to get some idea of when we are going to get rid of the boll weevil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. The problem now, so far as the ordinary species of boll weevil is concerned, is not a problem of eradication at all. At least it has not been so in recent years. It is a problem of working out cultural methods by which it is possible, as I understand, to produce cotton in the presence of the boll weevil, by making the crop mature earlier and by various other cultural methods which make it possible to produce cotton notwithstanding the fact that the boll weevil is in the country. Within the last two or three years, however, a new insecticide has been discovered, known as calcium arsenate. This is a very light, flocculent insecticide, which is sprayed onto the plants during the night, when the dew is on them, and sticks to the plants. When the boll weevil wakes up in the morning and starts to eat his breakfast he gets this poison along with it. As has been suggested, the method has proven quite successful in certain parts of the cotton belt. It has not been tried out in other parts of the cotton belt where conditions are different. In order to determine whether the same methods can be used in other places as were used in the place where they were originally tried it is necessary to make field tests, and these are being carried on and will be continued until it is determined whether the present methods can be universally used or whether it will be necessary to modify them in order to meet the different requirements of different sections of the cotton belt. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. I thank the gentleman. In answering the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] I will say that an attempt was made to exterminate the boll weevil when it first invaded this country from Mexico. Noncotton-raising zones were established and every possible effort was made. But I regret to say that on the information furnished from year to year there does not appear to be any prospect of exterminating the boll weevil.

I doubt that there is a single farm in the cotton belt to-day that is not infected by the boll weevil, and there are sections in which the industry has been absolutely destroyed. In many sections of the States in the cotton-producing belt it has been impossible to raise cotton. Cotton plantations have been abandoned. As stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, about four years ago a method of control by the use of calcium arsenate was discovered in Louisiana and has been used in all sections of the cotton belt as an effective method of control when properly applied. It has been possible to increase cotton production as much as $50 an acre in value where the method of control was properly applied as against farms in the same locality where it was not applied. So it is not a question of extermination—I do not know that you have exterminated the corn borer in Kansas or ever will—but this boll weevil threatens the industry of the whole country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that a method has been discovered and in general use by which the cotton-boll weevil can be controlled, and has it not been thoroughly demonstrated that if this method is thoroughly applied cotton can be raised in boll-weevil territory?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the purpose of this appropriation to develop a new method against the boll weevil?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. TILSON. It is not contemplated that this appropriation will be used for agents to go into the farmers' crops and destroy the boll weevil?

Mr. WILSON. No; but to instruct and guide in methods of control.

Mr. TILSON. What use is made of it?

Mr. WILSON. While the method of control is established, many important features are yet in the experimental stage. The poison must be applied according to the regulations of the department, and the farmers have not been able to do that alone, and they need the instruction and assistance of the agents or experts of the department to do it. In addition to that, it has been found necessary to continually follow up the manufacture of the calcium arsenate to see that it is up to the proper grade and standard. Another important feature is the development of machines and dusters by which to apply the calcium arsenate in order to work the cost down to a basis where the method of control is not too expensive.

Mr. TILSON. I am in favor of any scientific experimentation which is likely to produce results which can be applied by the individual on his own farm, and I think that is the field that the Department of Agriculture ought to occupy, and occupy thoroughly. Money expended in wise experimentation is well expended, but when it comes to "helping" people to do this and do that I am opposed to it.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman is not opposed to assisting up to the point where the demonstration is completed?

Mr. TILSON. I am in favor of finishing the experimentation to find the very best method of doing these things, but am not in favor of the Government doing them.

Mr. WILSON. While this method has proved effective, it is in some respects yet in the experimental stage, and it is more important to complete that experimentation to-day than it ever was.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Gentlemen who are not acquainted with the cotton country can not imagine the havoc wrought by the boll weevil throughout the South. In my home county there are usually produced from 20,000 to 30,000 bales of cotton annually. Last year the ravages of the boll weevil reduced that production to less than 2,000 bales. I traveled through acres and acres of as fine-looking cotton as any man ever saw in the world, great stalks with beautiful dark-green leaves on them, and in a field of 20 or 40 acres not over 40 bolls would be found.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Did these people use these methods?

Mr. CARTER. They did not; they had not the opportunity; and if the gentleman will indulge me a moment I will come to that. I own a little farm in Johnson County, Okla., on which some three hundred and odd acres were planted to cotton and cultivated. Usually there is raised on that amount of acreage about 125 to 150 bales of cotton. This year there was picked on that entire 300 acres 1 bale of cotton. The crop was completely destroyed. These are not exceptional cases, but typical cases common to all the cotton country. The boll weevil has completely destroyed the principal crop of the South, and I feel sure that gentlemen from all sections of the country ought and will take an interest in combating this evil, this menace not only to us in the South but a menace to the entire country and the entire world.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will.
